In Court

Since the juror showed some signs of distress, the court very kindly asked: "Mr. Juror, are you able to hear well?"

"I ought to be, Jedge, I jest paid $500 to have my ears fixed."

He was excused.

Nothing Doing

"Sir, I want your daughter for my wife."

Dangerous days

AHEAD

IN MIDWINTER you and your children need reserves of sturdy resistance to ward off those nasty colds. Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil will help you gain this resistance. Its Vitamin A promotes growth and fortifies against the common cold. And then there's a wealth of Vitamin D that helps build strong bones and teeth. Doctors will tell you how good it is for run-down adults as well as growing children. And the pleasant flavor of Scott's Emulsion makes it easy to take. Scott & Bowne, Bloomfield, N. J. Highest Possessions Above Monetary Value

What are the things which the average human being values most? A Wisconsin clergyman has been asking this question of leading men all over the country, and the answers, as analyzed by Channing Pollack for the American Magazine, indicate that most of the desirable possessions in people's lives cost them nothing in money.

A list of fifty such valuable possessions, for instance, shows that 48 of the 50 had no monetary cost. The three leaders are: Health, love of work and capacity for it; ability to look any man in the eye.

Most of these things, comments Mr. Pollock, are very common possessions, and yet nobody would take a million dollars for any one of the lot.

Can't Convince Police

"I saw you arguing with your wife on the street yesterday."

"Yes, I was trying to convince her that the police wouldn't refuse to tag the car merely because she insisted it was all right to park that near a fire plug."

Confident

"I want you to sell this property for what it will bring."

"I can get a better bid than that?"

Long-Buried Watch Runs

B. H. Von Glahn bought a watch of a Stockton (Calif.) jeweler in 1878 and lost it in a plowed field. Last spring the watch was found where it had been buried in the field 43 years, and was returned to Delmar Von Gahn, Yosemite council Boy Scout executive, who returned it to the jeweler that originally sold it to his father. The jeweler cleaned the watch, replaced a few parts and now it keeps good time.

Obituary

Knut O. Burtness was born August 12, 1857 at Ness Hallingdal, Norway. There he spent the early years of his boyhood. When he was nine years old, his parents following the impulse and desire to seek other lands, came to this country and settled on a farm in Rock county, Wisconsin in the year 1866. At the age of 20 he migrated west to find a home of his own. He settled in Worth county, Iowa.

Two years later, in the year 1879, he was united in marriage to Annie Lee with whom he lived until her death in 1918. Four children were born to bless this union. He then moved to this community. He was united in marriage to Thea Olson in the year 1921 with whom he has lived until his recent death.

He leaves to mourn his loss a true and faithful wife, three children, Adolph and Mrs. I. A. Hovrud of Holt and Carl of Ryder, No. Dak. One brother survives, Ole Burtness of Mekinock, N. Dak.

H. O. Hanson and family visited at the Leo Horien home Sunday evening.

MERRY CHRISTMAS

WHAT two words on human tongue are more heart-warming than those! They not only represent a friendly greeting, but in them are summed up the whole spirit of the Yuletide—brightness and laughter, joy of living and joy of giving, health and happiness, peace on earth and good will to all men.

It is a greeting which we will hear often in this community of ours during these happy days of the Christmas season. We will hear it on our streets, in our stores, along our country roads and in our homes. For ours is a friendly community and nowhere is that friendly greeting more sincere. It is not possible, however, for each of us to say "Merry Christmas!" to everyone and thus complete the happy circle of Yuletide good cheer.

But there is one who has that rare privilege, one who has been a welcome visitor at the firesides of the homes in this community throughout the year and who now claims the right to be the first to wish you joy at this joyous time. That one is your Home Paper.

So your Home Paper carries from you to all the community and from all the community to you this friendly greeting:

MERRY CHRISTMAS!

—THE PUBLISHERS

The Church Speaks

Everything in the month is pointing us to Christmas. It is His Advent of which we speak, His return we look forward to. The Bible has only one story to tell, the story of the wondrous Birth. The Saints bear their testimony, "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon and our hands have handled, of the word of life; that wich we have seen and heard declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us: and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with His Son Jesus Christ." 1 John 1:1-3.

The Blessed Babe will command our love and our eloquence. It is his Feast and we shall honor Him before all others. The appeal of the Babe is indeed universal. There is much that is material, grossly material, in our observance of Christmas. But, at least childhood receives attention and the Holy Child is spoken of, sung about and reverenced. Yet Christmas brings us more than a Babe. After all the Babe has a small part in the New Testament. It is "the Man, Christ Jesus" who fill its pages. "Unto you is born this day a Saviour which is Christ the Lord."

You can read in Nansen's "Farthest North" that one day he dropped his line out into the depths until it all ran out. Writing the date in his journal, with the length of his line, he added the note, "Deeper than that." The next day, adding to the line, he ran it out again and did not touch bottom. Again in the Journal the date the length of the line, and the note, "Deeper than that."

Taking all the line he could find the day following he dropped it into the deeps and still it swung in unplumbed depths. So it is with the word at Christmas. We tell of the Babe, but the message is deeper than that. We speak of the shepherds and the Magi, but Christmas is deeper than that. Not until we come to Calvary do we know all that Christmas means.

To-morrow we shall bring you to that cradle and finally weshall leave you at the cross or in the Garden where the tomb is.

Yours for a Merry Christmas,

Pavement Increase

With a net increase of 438 miles of pavement and 721 miles of bituminous treated gravel on trunk highways in Minnesota, one-quarter of the state trunk system now is paved and more than another quarter bituminous treated, according to the annual report issued by C. M. Babcock, commissioner of highways. The total amount of pavement was given in the report at 1,872.5 miles while the bituminous treated roads total 1,872.1 miles. In addition to these improved roads there are 1,349.8 miles of standard grade graveled roads and 1,620 miles of substandard grade graveled roads.

THE STORY

In the city of New Orleans, in 1821, Loren Garde, recently an officer under General Jackson, is surprised by the appearance, in ancient Spanish costume, of two men and a woman whose beauty enchants him. Resenting the arrogance of the elder of the two men, Garde fights with him and wounds him. He learns his opponent is Adolfo de Fuentes, colonel in the Spanish army in Venezuela. Garde overhears a plot to overthrow Spanish rule in Venezuela. Discovered, he fights, but is overpowered and made prisoner on the Santa Lucrecia, ship bearing arms for the Venezuelans. On board are the conspirators, the lady of his love, her brother Polito, and De Fuentes. From the girl, Garde learns her name is Dulce Lamartina. He loves her, but does not reveal his love. The vessel is wrecked and Garde reaches the Venezuelan shore, alone. He encounters a stranger and sees Dulce. The stranger, who is Captain Monahan of the British legion under Bolivar, urges Garde to join the Venesuelans, but his mind is set on again seeing Dulce. Monahan directs him to friends in Caracas. There, supplied by Monahan with the secret sign of the patriots, he is welcomed at the revolutionary headquarters. Garde attends the wedding of Dulce and De Fuentes. Dulce recognizes him and leaves De Fuentes at the altar. She is torn from Garde's arms. He escapes. Finding Garde, Dulce tells him her wedding to De Fuentes was to have been the price of Garde's life. They reveal their mutual love. Garde is made prisoner.

"You offer doubtful compliment; it would not have been clever at all, Your Majesty, if you were unfamiliar with the language of my native land."

"Then you are not Sourdez," he said, "christened Timoleon?"

"Of course not. Timoleon was only a screen. I am Loren Garde, and my father owns plantations near New Orleans."

"You have followed the Senorita from New Orleans?"

"Not so, Senor."

"Yet you are here."

"Aye, but by no wish of mine did I leave New Orleans."

Now he brought another charge against me: "You have made a fool of me before the people of Caracas."

"I have arrived upon this earth too late to make a fool of you, Senor."

Anger blazed in his eyes, died, then he smiled; yet his smile was a less pleasing thing than his anger. "The recklessness of the condemned, eh? I have seen it in men who are looking upon death."

"If the dead city of Tucayan is a fair example I am sure you have seen much of it."

"Tucayan is only a hint of what we intend to do to revolutionary Venezuela; they understand only the rule of force."

"Yet the rule of force, Senor," said I, "has always been a rule of failure. That is a lesson Spain has never learned."

He showed white teeth in a grim smile. "What lesson, then, do you gain from Tucayan, which we destroyed?"

"The last man in that dead city, a graybeard patriot, died in my arms, and with his last breath he cried, 'Viva Bolivar!' If a lesson is desired—"

"Carraca!" Adolfo's face went pale, and his manner, for an instant, was that of a hunted animal.

"Carraca, indeed, Senor; the reign of murder in Venezuela is nearly over, and your judgment tells you that it is, though ambition speaks another language. Spain has destroyed the wealth of Bolivar, a passing thing in any case, but this spirit—ah!"

"A rebel!" cried Adolfo. "Some day we will hang him in the Plaza San Jacinto."

"Spain has sought Bolivar now for just ten years, Senor, and failed. You will have to deal with Bolivar, and when you do—"

"When we shoot you, Senor Americano, tomorrow morning in the plaza before the great cathedral, Simon will lose another patriot, is it not so?"

"My father's arm is long," I said; "he has powerful friends in America, chief among them being Gen. Andrew Jackson, who will doubtless be our next President. I have sent a letter to my father, and if aught befalls me—"

"Bah!"

"Spain in Venezuela can ill afford to lose the friendship of the United States."

Adolfo grinned. "We stand to lose no friendships by executing a revolutionist, a man caught in the act of mutiny, a half-mad French sailor named Timoleon Sourdez, who brought a sacrilege upon the Church. We know nothing of Loren Garde, son of the wealthy Senor Garde of New Orleans, friend of Andrew Jackson."

I was silent for the simple reason that I had nothing to say, for I knew that his stand might seem a logical thing.

"For what purpose did the Senorita Lamartina visit you today?"

"She came to offer me an invitation to her wedding."

He snarled. "Does the droll Americano imagine that the noble lady of Spain might love him?"

"One never knows."

"Yet, loving you, why should she wed me?"

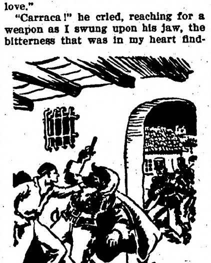
Adolfo's laughter rang through the house. "Assuredly; she does not love you. She must have her sport—and the lovelorn Americano offers himself. You do not understand women, eh, Senor?" He combed his black beard with heavy fingers. "The poor loco carries his heart upon his sleeve."

"Yet it required a gorgeous lie to bring her to the altar with you."

Adolfo swore softly. "She—she told you that?"

"Aye," said I, filled with a large conceit; "when the Senor Fuentes tried to stab a stupid ladrone in the city of New Orleans he lost his ladylove."

"Carraca!" he cried, reaching for a weapon as I swung upon his jaw, the bitterness that was in my heart finding full expression in violent action. He fell back against the wall, his right hand came up swiftly, bearing a pistol, but I struck his elbow and the gun clattered to the floor.



He Cried Out In Pain at My Blow.

Now, holding him against the wall with my left hand at his throat I drew back my right arm. "I have dreamed of a time when I should get my fingers on that fat neck of thine, Adolfo, and hold them there until the breath shall leave thy body; I have pictured that cynical face of thine as a punching-bag for my fist—so!"

He cried out in pain at my blow. "The Senorita told me this afternoon, Adolfo, that, tomorrow, she would wed thee." I laughed. "I shall see to it that thou dost not make a handsome bridegroom."

But my little minute was over all too quickly, for the guards rushed in and dragged me away from him. He caressed a bruised jaw with tentative fingers, tried a couple of teeth that were doubtless loose, spat a crimson blob upon the floor, and filled the air with a sulphurous flow of profanity.

I laughed aloud. "This day, Adolfo, has had the fulness of a lifetime, and tomorrow's sun will find me ready."

"Yet life," he said thickly, "might still be sweet to you? There is yet a way to win freedom. You may save your life on conditions."

I waited.

"That you leave Caracas tonight, and La Guaira tomorrow, and—"

"What else, Senor? I am waiting."

"That you tell me, now, where the Senorita Lamartina is."

"Name of G—d, Senor! Do you mean—?"

"The Americano is doubtless a clever actor; if he will tell me where I may find the Senorita he will see the way made open for a safe journey to New Orleans."

It came to me then that Adolfo hesitated to bring about my execution and hoped thereafter to win the Senorita's love.

"You and she must have had some understanding," he continued, "for, within the hour after she had returned to the home of the Senora Mendoza, we discovered that she had disappeared as completely as though some mythical air-god had carried her away. Polito, greatly agitated because of her vanishment, aided in the search, but to no avail. We have combed the city for hours, with no success. If you would win your freedom you will tell us whither she has gone; if not the morrow shall find you facing a firing squad."

I knew Adolfo would never keep his word, even had I been able to give him any information. "If the Senorita does not care to keep you advised of her plans, surely you cannot expect me—"

"Very well," he said; "we will place you for the night in a safe little cage that we may count on finding you tomorrow morning."

So, with four guards on each side and Colonel Fuentes bringing up the rear, we marched out of the house of Tomas Carrasco, crossed the patio, and bent our steps toward the gloomy pile of weathered stone whose dungeon-like chambers had held so many unfortunates.

CHAPTER VI

A Silver Night

As we marched along my mind was filled with sad uncertainties, grim forebodings, regrets for half-accomplished tasks. I would have like to live to see the independence of Venezuela, and I found myself wishing that I might have been spared to meet the Liberator, Simon Bolivar, the extraordinary man who had instilled in the hearts of his people a deathless love of independence.

And I wanted to see the Senorita again, to tell her of my love. How could she have covered up so completely all the signs of her escape? The city of Caracas was new to her. To have left Caracas would have been to leave a trail that anyone might have followed, and to have secreted herself in the city . . . The thing was impossible, for the men of La Torre could have searched every corner of it in an hour. Even Polito was in the dark.

As we approached the menage of Pedro Carrizal sounds of hilarity came from the interior—loud laughter and snatches of song.

We had come opposite when the door flew open and a man stood, swaying, in the lighted way. When he saw us he uttered a wild yell and toppled forward to the sidewalk. Even as the soldiers roared in high glee over the fall of the tipsy celebrant a torrent of men poured from the opened doorway and fell upon my guards before they could bring their guns to bear.

I turned to meet Adolfo, whose pistol pointed at my head. My outflung fingers found his wrist, and thrust his arm high as he sent a harmless bullet into the air, then I drove a fist into his broad face. Ah, the tingling joy it gave me! He went down and I threw myself upon him, fingers groping for his throat.

Adolfo cried aloud, he swore, he gasped, he writhed. He clawed vainly at my wrists, and kicked, and twisted his unwieldy body. I heard a shrill voice shrieking anathemas, a rasping voice that was my own, and it gave me a grievous shock that I had fallen so low.

Hands were laid upon my shoulders, dragging me from my victim. "Let me alone," I cried, "let me kill him!"

"No, Senor."

"Manuel!" I leaped to my feet.

"Come—come quickly." He caught my arm and led me away.

"But we must help them."

He laughed shortly. "Not at all, they need no help; it is the soldiers who will be crying for aid."

We ran swiftly for three minutes and stopped in a darkened alley where Manuel opened a package which had been secreted under a shed, disclosing a uniform. "Put it on quickly, Senor; in two minutes you must be a captain in his majesty's service."

Annapolis Royal, N. S., founded by Champlain in 1604 under the name of "Port Royal," is linked with modern civilization through the origin there of the fact, if not the term, "whoopee." During the long hard winters that Champlain and his garrison had to face, they made friends with the Indian chiefs of the region and celebrated nightly dinners in convivial fashion with them.

Each member of Champlain's staff took his turn as master of the ceremonial "whoopee," being charged with the preparation and the service of the dinner with its accompanying wines, songs and dances. Old Membertou, the aged but active Indian chief, was always an honored guest at these feasts, for which he furnished many a fine piece of game or fish taken in the wilds of Nova Scotia.

Cicadas, or true locusts, have the longest life cycle of any insect, with the seventeen-year locusts holding the record.

Valuable Crystal Ball

The crystal ball in the National museum in Washington is 12⅞ inches in diameter and weighs nearly 107 pounds. It is valued at $250,000. The block of rock crystal from which the ball was formed was found in Burma. It is said to have weighed more than half a ton in the rough.

PATERNAL INSTINCT

A Story of Great Devotion

By Fannie Hurst

(© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service.)

WHEN people used laughingly and entirely without opprobrium to refer to Kester's maternal instinct, his children, particularly his daughters, had formed a sort of unspoken compact to retort with unanimity: "What's the matter with paternal instinct? Aside from being the best mother alive, he's the best father."

It was their subconscious way of protecting Kester from innuendo. As if innuendo could have attached itself to the enormous-shouldered, six-foot parent of the brood of five youngsters who clustered about his tall knees, whenever those tall knees hove in sight.

Kester would not have minded had there been innuendo. Life was too big, too busy, too harassed, too delightful an affair, for fancied hurts or pricks to flourish. Well, if he had maternal instinct he hoped it was a jolly good one. Man with five growing, hungry, boisterous young ones needed pretty nearly every instinct there was. Lordy, what a gang! Five hungry mouths yawning up at him when he came home evenings, for all the world like beaky birds in their nest. Fellow got so he treated them precisely that way. Night after night, it was his custom to come home with a bag of one kind of fruit or another, in what the children called his "surprise pocket." Cherries, berries, plums, fruit balls, which he dropped into the little upturned mouths.

A blessed gang of ruffians was what Mrs. McMurtry, who tended the brood all day, called them. A blessed gang of ruffians and their daddy no better than the rest, flinging them around from the minute he entered the house.

That scarcely held, because when Mrs. McMurtry accused their daddy of boisterousness that matched his children's, her eyes were ridiculously out of key with her speech.

Her idolatry of Kester verged almost on the absurd. She used to cry over him while relating his various attributes to friends. "He's a saint; the man is, disguised in an overgrown boy's clothing."

It was rather on the basis of an over-grown boy and his younger playmates that Kester reared his children. A man left at twenty-eight with five small youngsters on his hands doesn't have time to work out a "system." At least Kester didn't. With the problem of earning their living, keeping the home together, educating them along the most economical lines possible and above all, keeping them happy, Kester plunged in without a theory.

So, in rearing his family, Kester was just himself. Easy, indulgent, ridiculously sentimental, unexactly, playful, the adoring parent, and yet withal so much the idealist where his children were concerned, that their shortcomings, when they became serious, could actually unnerve him to the extent of making him physically ill.

For instance, Myron, the second boy and his cruelty to animals: The scene between Kester and his son the evening his father found him in a group of boys tying cans to the tail of a wretched street dog was one that Mrs. McMurty, to the day of her all-too-premature death, was to relate with her face smeared with pallor.

For a moment it looked as if Kester were going to beat his son; batter him across the sides of the head with his fists. Miraculously that did not happen, but a talk took place up in the fastness of Myron's room that was devastating in its consequences. All night Myron sobbed in his bed and Kester did not appear at breakfast. The evening following, Myron fell asleep in Kester's arms, listening to a jungle story which he had asked his father to repeat. He was a strange boy and man, Kester was. A father and a mother, too.

His brood grew and thrived. At seventeen the eldest boy was a high school graduate and already a draughtsman apprentice. Myron chose medicine, and Kester somehow, on his newspaper photographer's salary, began to make that possible. Two of his three girls moved along into quite considerable beauty and the youngest gave promise of something more than even that.

Of course there were set-backs, incubus of debt, worry of illness and occasionally the need of discipline of one sort or another. When she was fourteen, Leila, the second girl, developed typhoid fever and Kester nursed her as a mother would have nursed her.

The year following, the mainstay of the household, blessed Mrs. McMurtry, died suddenly of heart stroke and that was a blow to Kester and his brood. Fortunately, Lily, the eldest, eighteen then, took over in total the duties which she had hitherto shared jointly with Mrs. McMurtry, and Leila, Edmee, and the boys, all lent shoulder to the wheel of household. Kester as always shared the burden. Absolutely without sense of pride or artificial barrier, he would think nothing of coming home of an evening, washing out towels, helping drape one of his daughters into a half-made party dress, or assisting with the dinner.

False pride? Poppycock. Nonsense. No reason why a man shouldn't do whatever chores present themselves. Silly convention that certain duties belong to one sex or the other. He who hesitates is lazy.

As gradually his brood began to marry off, those household chores automatically grew lighter. At forty-three, Kester was a grandfather. At forty-five, his last child had left the nest.

Life of course was simpler now. Financial responsibility lifted, sons and daughters well on their own, his own vigorous health unimpaired, there seemed future and good future ahead for Kester.

Father will marry again, now, the girls decided among themselves and affectionately set about scouting for timber worthy of him.

As a matter of fact, Kester's thoughts did turn that way. Even with their devotion, his children had their own interests now. Life was no longer the hurly-burly affair a growing family had made it. He had done a good job. The wife who had died bearing his last child, would have blessed him for it. His tribute to her lay in his success.

Slowly, but rather definitely, Kester's thoughts began to turn to the desirability of meeting some woman. . . .

It was along about this time that Myron's seven-year-old son began to exhibit certain qualities in his little makeup that secretly, for months, had been disturbing his parents to no small extent.

On various occasions, for this and that flagrant offense, the child had been sent home from school, finally on his eighth birthday actually meeting with final dismissal from school authorities who could no longer cope with him.

For another six months, secretly, and eager to spare his grandfather the fact, Myron and an adorably pretty wife struggled with the serious problem of this boy.

When he was nine, however, there came about the shocking occasion of Myron Junior being apprehended before the Juvenile court.

It was astonishing, the equanimity with which Kester took this mortal blow to his pride. As the wife of Myron put it, there was something actually heart-hurting about the way in which the grandfather of Myron Junior walked with the child out of court, hand in hand, quietly, and with a sweetness of manner that seemed to hold at bay the threat of violent hysteria which had hovered over the child during the courtroom procedure.

No doubt about it, father is simply a genius with children!

Kester himself evidently believes so. Myron Junior lives alone with his grandfather, in a small house they have taken on the outskirts of town. He is a serious, difficult, sometimes vicious little problem. There are some days when Kester cannot even report for his work. Myron Junior is one of those special cases that can baffle physicians, parents, teachers, alike.

Father will never marry now, his daughters agree, a little sadly. His genius with children won't let him. . . .

Happiness of Americans Impressed on Visitors

The first characteristic of the American people is their happiness. The visitor feels himself in the presence of a race with a keen zest for life, a sure confidence in the future, and much enjoyment of things as they are.

The American is more highly strung than the northern European, and in most cases this does not seem to lead to pessimism or a morbid condition. The impression of happiness is common to all classes. The people in the streets, in the shops, in the hotels, the lift man, the bellhop, the telephone operator—all are gay.

No doubt there is a material basis for this. A double income for a wage earner means more than twice the amount of amenities and enjoyment. The old orthodox tenent of European civilization, that "money does not bring happiness," is probably only a modern adaptation of Aesop's fable of the fox and the grapes.

Vast wealth does not bring happiness; but that small margin of spare money after necessities have been provided for constitutes in America the structure of what is definitely a larger life. In the United States this larger life—or rather, larger share of life in its natural and rightful balance—is enjoyed by an incomparably greater number than in any other country in the world.—Winston Churchill in Liberty.

Valley of Waterfalls

One of the most spectacular motor drives in the Canadian Rockies is that through the Yoho valley in Yoho National park, British Columbia. This valley is 14 miles long and more than one mile deep, walled in by almost perpendicular mountains covered with primeval forest. Six waterfalls leap down the mountain side within a distance of 10 miles, some of them ending in a cataract of spray. The most spectacular of all is Takakkaw, which in three different drops falls to the floor of the valley 1,650 feet from its crest above.

"Gold" Is Still There

All that glitters is not gold, P. E. Morrison, interior decorator from Philadelphia, visiting Reno, Nev., admitted after abandoning all illusions about prospecting, especially in old wells. A metallic gleam at the bottom of a dry shaft on the Birks ranch west of Reno lured Morrison to investigate. But when he had lowered himself with a rope to within four feet of the bottom, a chorus of hisses and buzzes informed him he was intruding on a rattlesnake residence. His shouts for help brought rescuers, including the fire department.

"Dew of Death"

Lady Cynthia Mosley, wife of the insurgent member of the British parliament and daughter of the late Marquis Curzon, told an audience of young people at Coventry that the next war will "finish civilization." She said that scientists have developed a new chemical known as the dew of death and that a teaspoonful of this explosive dropped over a city would kill a million people. Enough dew of death could be carried in a lady's handbag to absolutely raze the entire city of London, so she says. Chemical warfare experts derided the idea.—Pathfinder Magazine.

Landed Nine-Foot Shark

A nine-foot shark weighing several hundred pounds was harpooned at Ocracoke, N. C., by David Gaskill, Ocracoke, and Carl Jacobson, Washington, N. C. When the shark came within five feet of the boat, Gaskell threw the harpoon. It struck the shark in the back. The little boat was pulled several hundred yards down the channel. The shark was finally brought to the shore and landed with block and tackle.

Fireplace Outside

One Kentucky home owner has reversed the usual procedure of having a fireplace inside a room. He has built a fireplace on the outside of his house. The old-fashioned fireplace in its new-fashioned setting is seen in an outer wall, affording heat for an open portico during early spring and late autumn. Inside is a modern heating plant.

Coins of Yellow Metal "Minted" in California

For several years gold half-dollars and quarter dollars were issued in California. The half dollar of the first issue was round, the obverse showing a head of Liberty surrounded by a circle of 13 stars, and the reverse showing the date "1852" within a wreath of laurel and the legend, "Half Dol. California Gold." Some have on the reserve the date and the legend, "California Gold Half D." Later issues show various numbers of stars as well as change in design, some portraying an Indian head instead of Liberty, and octagonal in shape.

These half and quarter dollars were issued by private companies or individuals connected with the gold-mining interests, and in nearly every case reached the standard of value, weight and fineness claimed for them. While not considered legal coinage or legal tender, they were accepted at a time when there was a pressing need for money with which to transact the business of the country. Such coinage, however, is now prevented by existing laws.

Souvenir pieces resembling the gold half dollars were also issued during this period. They were made of composition metal, gold plated, and of course are not worth anything. The pure gold half dollars in a perfect state of preservation bring about a dollar.

Division of Wealth

Dr. Wilfred I. King estimated that the richest 1 per cent of the income recipients in the United States received in 1926 about one-eighth of the realized income in the country. Ninety-nine per cent of income receivers secured in 1926 87.84 per cent of the total income. In another estimate Doctor King concludes that 10 per cent of the people of the United States own nearly two-thirds of the wealth, while the poorest 26 per cent own just about 3½ per cent.

Christmas Decorations

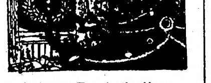
By Charles Frederick Wadsworth

ARRANGING decorations at Christmas time affords great pleasure in the planning and execution as well as in the beholding.

This is especially true in the home, but the merchant takes pride in his displays and strives to outdo his competitors.

Decorations to be most effective must be in perspective—to allow for the distance between the object and the eye.

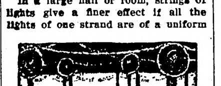
For instance, an intimate view permits the use of small objects or small units of objects, as for a Christmas tree in the home, whereas general decorations to be viewed from a greater distance—say, across the street—should be composed to allow for the diminution of the object by the greater distance.



Christmas Tree in the Home.

In a general way, the longer the view the larger the object, or the larger mass of small objects of the same kind, as in a store window display. A large number of small objects scattered haphazard over a given area, when viewed at a distance, lose effectiveness, while the same objects grouped as to size, color or shape, with proper spacing, render the display much more striking and effective.

In a large hall or room, strings of lights give a finer effect if all the lights of one strand are of a uniform color, the contrasts being between the strands as a whole rather than between the various colored lights on one strand and all strands alike. Alternating colors of a strand serves to neutralize the value of all; while the strands of solid colors give the contrast desired by the heavier weight of color in proportion to the room's dimensions.



For the Holiday Season.

Many cities and towns of late years have done considerable street decorating for the holiday season. These decorations often include strands of colored lights at the intersections, crossed from corner to corner. The natural thing is to arrange the strands with a red globe, then white, then blue. Looked at as a single unit at close range the effect is not bad, but as the general view is of several blocks, having all the lights at one intersection red, at the next white, and the next blue, gives an almost incredibly finer effect.

At Christmas Eve

By Rev. Abram Ryan
in Philadelphia Record

AH! there's nothing like a Christmas Eve
To change life's bitter gall to sweet,
And change the sweet to gall again;
To take the thorns from out our feet—
The thorns and all their dreary pain,
Only to put them back again.
To take old stings from out our heart—
Old stings that made them bleed and smart—
Only to sharpen them the more,
And press them back to the heart's core.

Ah! there's nothing like a Christmas Eve
To melt, with kindly glowing heat,
From off our souls the snow and sleet,
The dreary drift of wintry years,
Only to make the cold winds blow,
Only to make a colder snow;
And make it drift, and drift, and drift,
In flakes so icy cold and swift,
Until the heart that lies below
Is cold and colder than the snow.

CHRISTMAS MUSIC

Christmas Shopping

THE biting cold of a zero day, coupled with finding merchandise stocks badly depleted, filled many last minute shoppers with good resolutions to do their Christmas shopping early next year.

Marion English was one of those caught in the jam. It was now late in the afternoon, the next day would be Christmas, and there still was Uncle George, Cousin Essie and Old Mrs. Brighton unchecked on her list. What in the world could she get for them? Helplessly she wandered up and down the aisles. Why hadn't she heeded all the warnings to shop early? Well, they just would have to be satisfied with anything she could pick up now.

Yearningly, she looked up toward the balcony of the big store, where several persons were occupying comfortable chairs. And then an idea flashed through her brain.

Ten minutes later, she was walking through the crowded aisles again, but the worried look had left her face. In the short time she had taken to rest and think she had tried to put herself in the place of three persons for whom she was seeking gifts, and now, instead of just taking anything she had a very definite idea of what to get for the amount she had to spend. She remembered that Uncle George had a pet weakness for fancy socks, that Cousin Essie liked nothing better than new fiction, and she felt sure that Mrs. Brighton would welcome a pair of bright-colored bedroom slippers.

By 5:30 her selections were all made. This was the way to do Christmas shopping, she thought, not the haphazard way she had been doing it for years. She remembered now, with a pang, the rather inappropriate gifts she had chosen sometimes. Never again, she vowed, would she wait until the last minute to make selections. From now on, she would heed the many warnings to shop early, and so bring an added share of happiness to herself and others.

Time to Brush Up on Resolves

Now is the time of the year to start brushing up on the New Year resolutions you made last year and the year before that and the year before that.

STEADY NERVE OF MOUNTAIN GOATS

Not Easily Alarmed, and Expert Climbers.

Long before Glacier park was thought of as a park I watched an old goat and her young kid on a little shelf near the Sexton glacier on the side of Going-to-the-Sun mountain, Dr. Vernon Bailey writes, in Nature Magazine. The kid was lying down and the mother standing close against the sheer cliff at one side of the great glacier front.

Suddenly a mighty roar took my attention from the bear track I was following and fixed it on a cloud of ice spray rising from below the glacier as tons of ice broke loose and thundered down the sides of the mountain in a roaring avalanche. It shook the ground where I was, half a mile away, but the old goat, at the very edge of the ice-smoke, paid no attention and the kid did not get up. Who could but envy the even temper of their nerves?

Mountain goats are good climbers, strong and not afraid, but any experienced mountaineer can go where they can. From below it often looks impossible, but I have followed many of their trails up cliffs that from below looked like castle walls and always found foot room and a way to get from shelf to shelf. The great advantage of these high cliff shelves to the goat is that no carnivore dares to attack them there.

They have many enemies, chief among which are man, coyotes, wolves, bears, wildcats and eagles. In national parks, where man is now the protector instead of the destroyer of mountain goats, the prowling coyote and the more powerful timber wolf still get a few when they come down at night to feed in the alpine meadows.

Grizzly bears have been found feeding on goat carcasses at timberline in early spring, but possibly only as scavengers rather than killers. Occasionally mountain lion and Canada lynx tracks are found up close to the goat ledges, and it is a fair assumption that these big cats sometimes feast on the animals, as they do on mountain sheep and deer at lower levels.

Of necessity the goats must come down from the high rocks, where they spend the day, to feed at night in the little green meadows, and here lies their danger. Perhaps they would stay in these meadows if not alarmed, but at the first sign of an enemy they rush to the cliffs and are soon again on safe ground.

Eagles are known to kill, carry off and eat the young kids before they are large enough to defend themselves, although the mother goats are generally able to protect their young against such attacks.

Low-browed and stolid as the mother goat may appear, her watchfulness, care and affection for her young are just as evident as the finer and more demonstrative mother love in the higher types of the animal kingdom.

To see a mother goat climbing the steep chimney cracks of the Garden wall above Iceberg lake, scrambling across sliding talus, leaping from shelf to shelf up what appeared to be a sheer cliff, and followed by a wobbly-legged kid only a week old, has thrilled me with wonder and admiration.

Unhappiness in Letting Chivalry End at Altar

"If men would treat their wives with the same thoughtfulness and chivalry after marriage as they did prior to it," remarked Bernal Dyas, "I think the family circle would be happier. The trouble is that too many men look upon courtship as a sporting event, successfully climaxed at the altar.

"Yes, a lot of men are like a friend of mine who went home one afternoon with a limit of trout. As he stood gloating over them his wife remarked:

"'That's all very fine for you, but how about me? You never bring me candy, the way you did before we were married.'

"'Is that so,' drawled the husband, regarding his trout limit complacently. "Well, you never heard of a fisherman feeding bait to a fish after he'd caught it, did you?'"—Los Angeles Times.

Seek Lost Atlantis

To discover lost Atlantis is the mission for which H. H. S. Challenger is being outfitted. A pencil will automatically trace on a scroll of moving paper the gradient of the ocean bed as the ship steers across the area where a submarine mountain is alleged to be, about 250 miles north of the Azores. A report made to the admiralty in 1850 contains a chart showing a shallow patch of 48 fathoms, surrounded like an island by depths of 1,200 fathoms and the like. An attempt will be made to definitely prove or disprove the report.

Manxmen mind their deemsters. Obsolete except on Great Britain's minute Isle of Man, deemsters are medieval judges-of-all-work. They hear actions and criminal cases of every sort and preside over Manx grand juries.

Manxmen gathered recently to hear the swearing-in of Deemster Stevenson More. A great and respected veteran of the Manx bench, Mr. More has been in retirement for ten years. He has now been installed as sole deemster of one-half of the Isle of Man, upon taking the following mouth-filling Manx oath:

"By the wonderful works that God miraculously wrought in between heaven above and the earth beneath in six days and seven nights, I swear to execute the laws of the Isle justly between our sovereign lord the king and his subjects as indifferently as the herring's backbone doth lie in the midst of the fish."

A Manx elder explained: "The backbone of a herring lies 'indifferently'—that is without any 'difference' or deviation to the right or the left—in the fish. Our ancient deemster's oath is a constant reminder that herring was once almost the only food of Manxmen."—Time Magazine.

Uneasy Lion Speeds Bishop

When the bishop of Blackburn was photographed with a lion at a circus at Blackpool, England, recently, the flashlight made the lion restive, and the bishop and his party left the tent as speedily as dignified bishops can exit. The bishop had been conducting a mission on the Blackpool beach, beach, and, with other clergymen, visited the circus to talk to the performers. The photograph, the flash and the flight interrupted the conversation.

The old year is almost spent and the new year only a week away. It is worth while to look backward long enough to fix in mind some of the mistakes we have made and then begin the new year right with a new grip on things and a firm determination to do better, both for ourselves and our fellow men.

Congress is enjoying a holiday vacation. It is to be hoped that all the members will resume their duties filled with a resolution to give the people some kind of relief regardless of politics.

We have been told that money talks. If that holds thru, then, it must now have such a bad throat that it can't even let out a little whisper.

One farmer here says he can go to the white house and be the big dominating exponet for ten grand a year. At that we are commencing to believe that he would not only make a decent living, but probably be conscientious enough about his fellow men so as to instruct the representatives of the people whom assemble in congress, to give the people something for the big salaries they draw, outside of a mess of technical laws that the poor man is forced to break in order to stay one jump ahead of starvation.

Taxpayers League

Curtailment of highway construction from county tax funds, reduction of real estate valuations, salary cuts, and revision of poor system of the county from the township to county system, were the major recommendations passed in resolution at the organization meeting of the Marshall County Taxpayers' League held at the court house in Warren December 18.

Approximately 400 people from every section of the county crowded their way into the court room and corridors of the court house that day to take part in the discussions regarding the taxation problems of the county.

All temporary officers chosen at the preliminary meeting held in Warren on Nov. 28, were elected to head the organization until the next annual meeting. These officers include F. A. Green of Stephen, president, Donald Robertson, Argyle, secretary; J. J. Sinclair, Stephen, treasurer and Andrew Melgard of Warren vice-president.

Resolved that:

To all public officials, the County Board, Town Boards, School District boards, and village boards, the following resolutions are made:

1. That all public expenses be kept down as low as possible. That no new improvements be made except when absolutely necessary. No new roads to be constructed out of tax moneys for at least five years.

2. A reduction of the valuation of all real estate in the county of Marshall of at least 40 per cent.

A reduction in the salaries of all county officials, and all other public employees.

3. That the Town System of caring for the poor be changed to the County system, and that the question of such change be submitted to the voters of Marshall county at the next general election.

4. All legal voters are urged to vote for the constitutional amendment of subjecting state owned land to taxation.

5. That the Marshall County Tax-payers Association will work in harmony with all public officials to the end that the taxes may be reduced to the minimum.

A constitutional committee was also appointed who drew up the following constitution which was adopted:

Article 1. The name of this association shall be the Marshall County Tax Payers League.

Article 2. Its objects and purposes shall be:
1. To reduce taxes.
2. To keep the public bonded debt within due bounds.
3. To co-operate with public officials to stop wasteful and unnecessay expenditures of public funds.

Article 3. The membership of this organization shall consist of every resident taxpayer of the county of Marshall.

Article 4. The board of directors of this organization shall consist of the chairman and the clerk of each town board and the Mayor or President and the clerk of each city or village in the county of Marshall.

Article 5. All expenses of the organization shall be borne by popular subscriptions.

Article 6. The annual meeting of this association shall be held on the first Saturday in June of each year at such place as the President may designate; and the annual meeting of the board of directors shall take place immediately thereafter.

Article 7. The officers of the association shall consist of a President, a Vice President, a Secretary and a Treasurer.
—Warren Sheaf.

News Review of Current Events the World Over

Representative McFadden's Violent Attack on President Hoover Stirs House—Chicago Wins the Republican National Convention.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

TWO Republican members of congress from Pennsylvania—Representative Louis McFadden and Senator David A. Reed—stirred up the national legislature by violent attacks on the policy of President Hoover and the administration in relation to the moratorium on intergovernmental debts and the suggested revival of the refunding commission with the possibility of cancellation of war debts. McFadden, former chairman of the house banking and currency committee, was especially bitter in his hour-long speech, asserting that Mr. Hoover had "sold out" the United States to "the German international bankers" whom he named as Kuhn, Loeb & Co., the Seligmans, Paul Warburg and "their satellites." He said the administration's course in working for acceptance of the moratorium was like "the ways of an oriental potentate drunk with power." He declared the President's unofficial poll of congress last June was "a crude attempt to usurp legislative power."

L. McFadden

Representative John J. O'Connor of New York, a Tammany Democrat, jumped to his feet shouting to the Republicans:

"It's my President as well as yours he's talking about, and if none of you will defend him from charges which are grounds for impeachment, I'm going to."

But Burnett M. Chiperfield of Illinois, Republican, was already up and his reply was vigorous and adequate. Said he:

"If the gentleman (McFadden) means what he says and if the gentleman is sincere, let him and his associates prepare articles of impeachment against the President of the United States and let those articles of impeachment be tried, and then the proof may be known, and let the guilt and infamy and horror fall where it may. The President of the United States would ask for such action, knowing that the truth and a fair inquiry would vindicate him. . . .

"Ladies and gentlemen, if there is one particle of integrity in the statement the gentleman has made, let the gentleman produce proof of the charges. Let him show that we have a President who is unworthy of occupying that high office or let him go from this chamber as a foul traducer of the character of an honest man."

SENATOR REED, who has often been regarded as the spokesman for Secretary Mellon, denounced what he called the propaganda by the international bankers to force cancellation for their own selfish interests, and he declared flatly that he was opposed to the revival of the war debt commission as proposed by the President.

"We have cancelled," he said, "all we are going to cancel; it is within the capacity of most of the nations of Europe to pay us the amounts they owe us, and as long as that fact stares us in the face it is sheer imbecility for us to be any more generous than we have been in the past."

Senators McKellar of Tennessee and Johnson of California followed in much the same vein and both declared they would not vote even for the one year moratorium. The latter was before the house ways and means committee and Undersecretary Mills and Secretary of State Stimson both appeared before that body to urge ratification.

SPEAKER GARNER and Senator Robinson announced that the Democratic joint policy committee had determined that the Hoover moratorium was not a subject matter for party consideration and should be left open to the personal views of the Democratic members. The committee also decided that every possible effort would be made to reduce government expenditures, but did not reach an agreement on details with respect to the tariff or tax revision, leaving these with other matters for future consideration.

Senator Moses

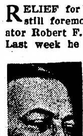
The first bill to reach actual committee discussion in the senate was one introduced by Senator Hale, to authorize building the navy up to the London treaty limits.

Organization of the senate was accomplished by the election of committee chairmen, but the deadlock over the choice of a president pro tempore was not broken. The progressives opposing the re-election of Senator George Moses of New Hampshire would not give in, and Moses continued to preside. One day the recalcitrants delivered their entire vote to Senator Vandenberg of Michigan, a regular who was a leader of the so-called "young guard" last session. But both Vandenberg and the young guard spurned this overture and continued to vote for Moses.

CHICAGO captured the Republican national convention of 1932, the administration's alleged opposition to that city not manifesting itself. The national committee, presided over by Chairman Fess, listened to earnest arguments in favor of Chicago and Atlantic City, and on the first ballot gave 86 votes to the former and 14 to the latter. The choice was then made unanimous. Cleveland, Detroit, Philadelphia and St. Louis withdrew their bids before the balloting began, none of them having been able to raise the money for the convention expense. The committee decided that the convention should be called for the 14th of June.

Chicago guarantees up to $150,000 to pay for the expenses of the G. O. P. gathering, and her hotels have agreed to accommodate 3,500 delegates, alternates and newspaper men at rates of from $1.50 to $4 a day. The convention will be held in the new stadium, which can seat about 30,000 and which has ample accommodations for committees, etc. It has a cantilever roof without obstructing pillars, a modern ventilating and refrigerating system, excellent acoustics and a fine pipe organ. The only drawback is the fact that the stadium is located on the West side, several miles from the hotels that will house the visitors.

RELIEF for the nation's jobless is still foremost in the mind of Senator Robert F. Wagner of New York. Last week he introduced in the senate a resolution designed to set in motion the machinery created by the federal employment stabilization act which was passed last session at his instance. This would mean a start on a two billion-dollar federal public works program that would give give employment to thousands of men.



Sen. Wagner

In the preamble to his resolution, Senator Wagner set forth facts and figures showing the gravity of the depression. After citing the numbers of unemployed, the many bank failures and the falling off in production, he showed that the volume of construction for the third quarter of 1931 was $858,000,000 or 53 per cent less than for the third quarter of 1928; that the volume of building contracts awarded declined $2,447,300,000 in the first nine months of 1931 below the similar period in 1928; that the volume of construction of public works and public utilities has fallen from $1,039,043,000 in the first nine months of 1928 to $982,700,000; that the wholesale prices of building materials declined from an index of 82.9 in January to 74.9 in September, that money spent for relief in the larger American cities was in September, 1931, 142 per cent greater than in September, 1930, and in October, 1931, 113 per cent greater than in October, 1930.

OVER in Basel, Switzerland, the Young plan advisory committee, of which Alfredo Beneduce of Italy is chairman, was said to have abandoned any intention of making strong recommendations for the complete abolition of reparations payments by Germany, although this was strongly urged by Colijn, neutral Dutch member, and favored by others. The committee's mind was probably changed by the firm stand taken by Walter W. Stewart, United States member, against the scaling down of war debts, but Europe still hopes the American attitude will be more lenient in a few months. The advisory committee will merely report to the various governments the facts uncovered concerning Germany's capacity to pay, and action will be put up to the final reparations conference that probably will be held late in January.

A. Beneduce

A technical subcommittee submitted a written report to Chairman Beneduce on German holdings abroad and the holdings of foreigners in Germany with a view to establishing the net debt of the reich. The figures were held in secrecy.

It was understood this subcommittee suggested it was impossible to uncover all German investments abroad and intimated that they were much larger than the 9,700,000,000 reichsmarks listed in the Wiggin report as of December 31, 1930.

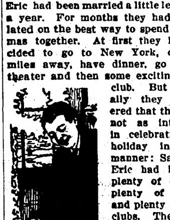
"Lena" The Christmas Present

By Martha Banning Thomas

IT WASN'T in the least like Christmas. Sally stood at the window and surveyed the dripping trees, the soggy road. A gray fog lay upon the hills; the sky was the color of gun metal.

"I wouldn't care about any old weather," thought Sally dismally, "if Eric were here. Of course I understand that he had to go to town to meet his cousin Lena. He couldn't decently do anything else, but this is our first Christmas together . . . and it's sort of lonesome out here in the country."

Sally was twenty-three. She and Eric had been married a little less than a year. For months they had speculated on the best way to spend Christmas together. At first they had decided to go to New York, only 40 miles away, have dinner, go to the theater and then some exciting night club. But gradually they discovered that they were not as interested in celebrating the holiday in this manner: Sally and Eric had been to plenty of dinners, plenty of dances and plenty of night clubs. They were a bit fed up. After considerable argument and trying to find out what the other really wanted, they came to the grand conclusion that they would get a thrill out of Christmas at home in their little house in the country.



"No party," said Eric.

"No guests," chimed in Sally.

"Nothing . . . but Christmas and us!" They had shaken hands solemnly on this.

They had talked over the dinner, which Sally was to prepare herself (the maid having begged to be let off to go to her family for the day). They had decided on the kind of Christmas tree they wanted; Eric had gone out two days ago and chopped it down. They had trimmed it with the glitter of make-believe icicles and silver-blue lights. They had shopped furiously, buying quantities of jokes and silly presents. These two young things, very much in love and full of zest and ideas, swept away the more obvious entertainments in one gesture. They were as excited as children.

Then at 2:00 o'clock of the afternoon the day before Christmas, while Eric was chuckling to himself over some ridiculous gift he was wrapping up for Sally, the telephone rang.

Eric talked very hurriedly into the transmitter. And in a low tone, Sally could hardly hear what he said. When he hung up the receiver he announced that he must leave for town at once. "But why?" asked Sally.

"Well," he hesitated, "you see I've got to meet Lena. She's just come."

"Oh, er . . . a sort of cousin. Terribly sorry, old girl. I'll tear over in the buzz-buggy and be back in no time."

So, he had gone. And the trees dripped. And the sky grew dark. And Sally cried a little and decided this Christmas eve was the horridest she'd ever spent.

She tried to remember if she had ever heard Eric speak of Lena before. "A wretched name," she said aloud, "and probably a perfect nit-wit of a girl. One of his odious relatives."

She waited and waited. Christmas eve was going to be spoiled. She could tell that. Why hadn't they gone to New York like everyone else? Then this Lena pest would never have roped in Eric.

At 6:30 the telephone jingled. Sally flew to answer it. "Sally, darling, I'm a bit delayed. Just called up to tell you not to worry. Traffic heavy . . ."

"Oh yes," said Sally in a cool polite voice.

"I'm bringing Lena home, dear. I know you'll like her. Expect us about quarter past seven."

Sally was in a rage. How dare he spoil their cherished Christmas by bringing home a stranger? How cruel . . . how thoughtless!

At quarter past seven she heard the car rush into the drive before the door. Her heart hardened. She went to the kitchen and looked into a closet.

She heard footsteps in the dining room. The swinging door pushed open. Then before she could catch her breath, Eric had her by the hand. He literally dragged her into the dining room, through the living room to the front door. "Got to meet Lena right away," he laughed. He thrust her out of the door on to the tiny porch. "Lena!" shouted Eric, "God bless 'er—there she stands!"

Sally blinked. Tears of rage dried in her eyes. "Lena?" she murmured in a foolish little voice, "Eric . . . what have you done?"

A small, smart car stood by the steps. Light from the house flowed along its polished sides. It panted gently with a quiet engine.

"Meet the wife, Lena," said Eric and made an elaborate gesture of introduction.

"Whose?" demanded Sally.

"Yours, woman! Christmas present! Delayed in delivery! Had to go in to get her. Thought I'd give you a whirl. Like the looks of the dear girl?"

"Oh, Eric . . . she's superb. You wonderful boy!"

The trees dripped. The fog closed in. The country road became soggier than ever . . . but Sally declared it was perfect Christmas weather.

"I feel I really ought to offer her a piece of turkey," said Eric at dinner, "with a little gasoline gravy!"

Mystery of Hermit of Appledore

By CLARISSA MACKIE

(©, by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service.)

"FANCY!" exclaimed young Mrs. Peterby to her husband, "I have heard the strangest thing, Dick—but perhaps you'd rather not hear it."

"Guess I can stand it," and Mr. Peterby smiled at their guest, an old college friend of Millie Peterby's, Grace Chame. "Can't scare us, eh, Miss Chame?"

"Well, you know that old camp up on the side of the mountain?" began Mrs. Peterby. "Well, a man is living there—and people say that he is a hermit, but Mrs. Wellminder told me yesterday, in confidence, that he is not a hermit—and not only that, but that he is a well-known author who is living there, writing a book. He lives that way so as to be by himself.

"I met him yesterday," Mrs. Peterby continued, "and although he did not see me—I am sure that he did not—I recognized him at once as some one I used to know in Kerryville."

"That's a very pretty story, my dear, but don't dare try to get acquainted with this beautiful youth."

"Yes—it will be heaps of fun—I haven't been for years."

"We will have to climb the hill first—it is on the land of the old Porter estate—rather wild up there."

It was after eleven o'clock when the two girls started out with the big dog. They had had an early lunch and were carefree. Mrs. Peterby's little car carried them part way up the side of the mountain, and they left it at a small cottage.

The two girls kept on the upward inclining road for another mile, and they stopped breathlessly and sat down to rest outside the gate of the old Porter residence. Don ran hither and thither, stirring up a rabbit or frightening the birds, but after awhile he disappeared.

They wandered along the mountain road, picking up nuts from under the broad chestnut trees, and from under a black walnut tree that grew near the Porter place. In the distance they heard Don's glad bark.

"Is he calling for us to come along?" asked Grace Chame.

"I am not sure," admitted Mrs. Peterby, "that sounds just like his family bark, doesn't it? He is your dog, Grace, you ought to know his speech!"

Grace listened intently. "Why," she spoke in surprise, "it sounds just as though he had met some one that he knew."

"Perhaps he is acquainted with the hermit," said Mrs. Peterby carelessly.

"What is his name?" asked Grace.

Mrs. Peterby was silent, then she admitted with a foolish smile. "To tell the truth, I haven't the least idea!"

They could not hear Don barking now, and in the mountain stillness, there was only the music of the wind in the trees, and the song of a belated bird. Their baskets were filled with nuts, so they resolved to follow the dog, and learn his whereabouts.

They had not gone very far when Miss Chame spoke rapidly. "Wait here, Mollie, behind these bushes—look straight ahead—isn't that darling?"

They could see a spreading knoll where there were scattered birches and oaks—there was a flame of color from every tree—but it was not the scenery that mattered much, excepting that huge log on which lay Don, the great dog, his happy eyes lifted toward the artist who painted him.

"Good dog!" said the big man behind the easel. "Just five minutes longer, Don, old man, and then you may lead me to the loveliest lady in the whole world."

Don barked ecstatically.

"An artist?" whispered Mrs. Peterby to Grace Chame. "Why—why—he might be the young man whom you quarreled with, Grace!"

"It is!" exclaimed Grace.

"Are you no longer in love with him?"

Grace was so silent that her hostess guessed the answer. Just at that moment the painter spoke to Don.

"Now Don, we will go and find our sweetheart!" and just then Mrs. Peterby stepped forward and Grace Chame slowly followed.

"Ah, Don!" called Mrs. Peterby, as the dog came bounding. She nodded at the handsome young man who hurried forward to explain. "Just tell Miss Chame all about it—Don and I must hurry on ahead!" and so she fled with happy Don to lead the way.

Grace Chame's eyes glowed with a soft fire as the artist stopped beside her. "I did not know you were here until Don came bounding upon me," he explained. "I have been making a good sketch of him. This is a wonderful country."

"I am spending a month with my old classmate," murmured Grace blushing beneath his ardent eyes, "Mrs. Dick Peterby? Do you know them?"

"Yes, indeed—it was through Dick that I heard about this mountain. I hope you will let me come and see you—sometimes, Grace."

What Grace told him made him the happiest man in the world at that particular moment, and all reports say that he is the happiest man in the world now, long after they are married.

Highest Happiness in Labor Well Performed

Today the most welcome word that can come to millions is a promise of employment—to have a share in the world's work. The song on which many of the older generation were brought up urged one to work in the morning hours, to work 'mid springing flowers, to work even through the sunny noon, and then on till the "last beam fadeth, fadeth to shine no more." But it was a joyous song, and the only unhappy note in it was the one that suggested the oncoming of night, "when man works no more." The most fervent prayer that most men make, especially those who have not much goods laid up against days of ease, come from ancient times: "May I be taken in the midst of my work."

So far from work being a curse, Carlyle speaks of it as "the grand cure of all the maladies and miseries that ever beset mankind." It is the best physician. So in seeking to find employment for those out of work, the problem of misery is attacked at its root.

Skill in labor is man's highest vocation, but it is through labor of some sort, whether by hand or brain, whether of one's choice or by compulsion, whether as a vocation or an an avocation, that he finds his way to his better and best self.

Giving a man a job is the best form of helpfulness, if he is still able to work.

It has been often said that there is no good obtainable without labor; but it is better said that there is no good that is to be put above the ability and the opportunity to labor.—Kansas City Times.

Mercolized Wax Keeps Skin Young

Get an ounce and use as directed. Fine particles of aged skin peel off until all defects such as pimples, liver spots, tan and freckles disappear. Skin is then soft and velvety. Unbreakable Spectacles

Unbreakable spectacle lenses are a recent invention. Two pieces of glass with a piece of celluloid between them are cemented together under pressure, forming one solid piece. This glass sandwich is slightly thicker than ordinary glass, but it is just as transparent, the celluloid being invisible. Unbreakable glass has for some time been employed in the windshields of motor vehicles and airplanes and in goggles, but this is believed to be its first use in spectacles.

Magistrate Had "Called the Turn," Unknowingly

The president of the Oxford union completed his term of office and came down to London to see some friends. The friends were congenial, not to say convivial, and in the early hours of the morning the president of the union was found reposing in a wheelbarrow in the middle of Piccadilly circus by a policeman.

Before the magistrate, the president, having very little recollection of what had happened, decided to bluff it out. The magistrate wanted to know why he had chosen a wheelbarrow for a resting place.

The president replied that he was there "for purely valetudinarian reasons."

The magistrate pointed out the offender's lack of responsibility and respect for the court. "You talk," he added, "as if you were 'er, well, president of the Oxford union."

And the president leaned over the dock and in a very soft and tender voice said:

There is an old story of the late Senator Caraway of Arkansas, and a speech he is alleged to have made in the senate, which may not be true; but it is fair to recall it because it might be true, and it is illustrative of some of his ways. The story is that he had been mildly called to account for what appeared to be a rather excessive attack on the integrity of a Republican senator. He apologized, says the yarn, somewhat after this manner:

"I am sorry if anything I have said appears to reflect on the character of my distinguished friend on the other side. I know nothing whatever against him. I have no facts whatever to support any assault upon him; and I would go no further than to say that he is not one whom I would choose to have serve on the board of directors of my home town bank."—Washington Star.

Tortoises, of course, cost money to buy, but snails can be picked up by the roadside. And neither of these "racers" needs an elaborate track.

THE STORY

In the city of New Orleans, in 1821, Loren Garde, recently an officer under General Jackson, is surprised by the appearance, in ancient Spanish costume, of two men and a woman whose beauty enchants him. Resenting the arrogance of the elder of the two men, Garde fights with him and wounds him. He learns his opponent is Adolfo de Fuentes, colonel in the Spanish army in Venezuela. Garde overhears a plot to overthrow Spanish rule in Venezuela. Discovered, he fights, but is overpowered and made prisoner on the Santa Lucrecia, ship bearing arms for the Venezuelans. On board are the conspirators, the lady of his love, her brother Polito, and De Fuentes. From the girl, Garde learns her name is Dulce Lamartina. He loves her, but does not reveal his love. The vessel is wrecked and Garde reaches the Venezuelan shore, alone. He encounters a stranger and sees Dulce. The stranger, who is Captain Monahan of the British legion under Bolivar, urges Garde to join the Venezuelans, but his mind is set on again seeing Dulce. Monahan directs him to friends in Caracas. There, supplied by Monahan with the secret sign of the patriots, he is welcomed at the revolutionary headquarters. Garde attends the wedding of Dulce and De Fuentes. Dulce recognizes him and leaves De Fuentes at the altar. She is torn from Garde's arms. He escapes. Finding Garde, Dulce tells him her wedding to De Fuentes was to have been the price of Garde's life. They reveal their mutual love. Garde is made prisoner. From De Fuentes, Garde learns that Dulce has disappeared. He is rescued from prison by a revolutionist, Manuel.

I laughed softly, for I saw another chance at life, and another chance to win the glorious Lamartina. "If Bolivar has many men like you, Manuel—"

We turned toward the south and ran for half a mile, stopping at last in the gloom afforded by a tall adobe building. Here we found two horses, one saddled for travel, and the other already bearing a man. "Polito!" I cried, for the rider's head and throat were almost concealed by the folds of a bandage.

His shoulders shook, in silent laughter I supposed, and he whispered something unintelligible and gestured toward the other horse.

"But, Polito, my friend," I objected, "you cannot do this thing. It will wreck your career, and—and you owe me no sacrifice. I cannot let you; rather would I seek the firing squad."

The gauntleted hand that Polito put upon my shoulder shook a little. He tried to speak, gasped, caught at his throat, and went off into a convulsion of coughing.

Manuel spoke, deep earnestness in his voice: "You must do as we suggest, Senor, for many things of importance depend upon it. We plan a swift stroke, Senor, and your assistance is necessary in our planning. Besides, you owe your life to those who follow Bolivar. Have not a score of men this night jeopardized their lives for thee? Have not I?"

Now I was ashamed, for the crafty Manuel spoke only truth. "Yes, my friend," said I. I threw a leg over the horse, and the swarthy sailor proffered a pistol, which I pocketed. I put a hand on his shoulder. "If Bolivar needs another arm, Senor, he will find mine strong enough, and very willing indeed, for I owe him much."

"Viva!" said the sailor. "Point your horses toward the Southern cross and ride throughout the night; ride swiftly, for the mounts you have are the best this city affords. Sunrise should find you beyond Ocumare, where the lines of Bolivar begin, and where you will find safety. Now, adios . . . A pleasant trip to both of you!"

With the flaming Southern cross to point the way, with the glory of the full moon above, the open country ahead, a fine horse between my knees, and a companion . . . well, perhaps my companion did lack necessary companionable qualities. Yet I could attribute some of his silence to his cold and the rest of it to the black thoughts that must possess him, for no man turns his back upon his country with a light heart.

With a sidelong glance I studied the lithe figure that even the black and gray cloak could not entirely hide.

"A perfect night, Polito, eh?"

He nodded.

"You are silent, my friend."

He turned his head to give me one swift look, then regarded the road again.

"I must thank you, Polito, for the part you took in my escape this night. Adolfo planned to have me shot tomorrow morning, so my life is yours."

This brought a gasp—no more—and I tried again: "Do you know, my friend," I ventured, "where your sister is?"

He was silent, and I continued: "I have told the Senorita, Polito, of my love, and failed miserably, as I deserve."

He offered no comment.

"She told me, today, in the home of the good Tomas, that tomorrow she would wed De Fuentes."

"No," he whispered, "no!"

"A sort of sacrifice, my friend, for what she imagines I have done for her; a thing that makes me love her very much."

"But she would not—" he said.

"Not now, there is no need. Besides," now I laughed, "Adolfo will marry no one tomorrow, Polito, nor the day after, nor for many days, because the proud colonel will never go into the cathedral and stand up before the people of Caracas with the face that he will be wearing tomorrow."

Polito put out a gauntleted hand. "What?" he questioned. "You have—?"

"I have done everything but kill him, my friend, and Manuel and his courageous intrigants stayed me just in time. Something in my blood calls for his life. We are proud, Polito, and he has called me ladrone. In New Orleans did he not try to kill me?"

Polito nodded, and many weary miles were put behind us before another word was spoken. The moon was yet an hour above the crest of the Carabobo hills when we passed through the sleeping hamlet of Cua and, turning our horses toward the southeast, took the broad road that led to Ocumare. From Ocumare we went south again, between fields of cane and maize, and of melons barely visible in the graying dawn.

Swiftly we took the gentle ascent approaching the broad range that is the barrier betwen the waters of the Orinoco and the Caribbean sea. We thundered through a canon, and a pass opened out ahead of us, a wide pass on the southern rim of a vast amphitheater. Here we stopped our panting horses and surveyed the scene ahead of us. Beyond the pass would lay, manifestly, the valley of the Orinoco, and the valley of the Orinoco would be, we knew, under control of those who served Bolivar.

"Polito," I said, "I do not know why you approach the lines of the revolutionists. You are, therefore, in danger, for a Spanish officer in the hands of Venezuelans who have heard, ere this, of Tucayan would have little chance for his life. Ocumare, with safety for you, lies not so far behind us."

He sat with head averted. "I do not care," he whispered; "could we not—?"

"You throw your life away, Senor; besides, the Senorita Dulce will surely need you."

"But, Senor," he whispered, "will—?"

I think it had been his desire to ask what chance I, in Spanish uniform, might have with the followers of Bolivar, but an interruption came, an interruption in the guise of a body of armed horsemen, who, approaching from the southward, appeared in the pass, weapons gleaming in the morning light.

"I am terrified, Senor!"

I turned upon my companion in amazement, for Polito would never have said that. "Mother of G—d, Senorita, what madness is this?"

I had ridden beside her through the night, had talked of many things. What had I said, what stupid blunders had I made? I had professed a deathless love for her, and had failed to see through a simple disguise. But for that look of terror in her eyes I should have laughed.

"I—I would leave Caracas, Senor."

She had given herself into my keeping, had permitted me to tell her of my love. Ah, that was a joy! Now the horsemen let out wild yells and bore down upon us.

"There is no safety here for you. Senorita; anyone who is Spanish—"

"Yes, Senor, yes; I must go."

"You will be safe in Ocumare." Dismounting I caught the bridle of her horse and whirled him around toward the north. "When this nightmare of murder is over, Senorita, shall I find you—?"

She nodded. "God preserve you, Senor," she said softly.

"Adios, then!"

She waved an arm and, bending low in the saddle, disappeared in the mouth of the canyon. The sounds of her going had died away before the revolutionists came to where I stood, waiting. They circled around me, guns to the fore, and I raised empty hands above my head. "Take me to your officer," I said, a great happiness filling my soul.

So, closely guarded by at least a score of horsemen, I rode slowly across the amphitheater and through the wide pass, coming at last to a level space where a body of men encamped beside the road. None, so far as I could see, was in uniform except one tall man. One of my captors spat out a stream of unintelligible jargon, and the officer's face grew grimmer as the story proceeded.

Now he faced me, his black eyes holding a hostile glint. "You may tell me who you are, my captain."

"I am Loren Garde, an American, come to offer service to Bolivar."

"In a Spanish uniform! A likely tale, Senor. Why do you offer service to our general?"

"Because I do not like the Spanish," I said.

He showed white teeth in a pleased grin. "If you do not like the Spanish, Senor, why the uniform?"

"One must get through the lines of Spain; this uniform has been borrowed for the occasion, and the former owner of it doubtless nurses a broken head." I smiled reassuringly, but met no response in his eyes.

"Your story is interesting, Senor. Now tell me, if your desire to serve us is sincere, why you aided the Spanish officer to escape."

What could I say? Could I tell him that the Spanish officer was the Senorita Lamartina, fiancee of Colonel de Fuentes, and that I, coming to offer service to Bolivar, had sent her back to the safety of the Spanish lines? Could I have hoped to make him believe such a preposterous tale?

"Perhaps," said the officer after what he must have considered a sufficient wait, "perhaps this companero of yours was the Dauphin in disguise—eh?"

"We might just as well call him the Dauphin," I said hopelessly.

He offered another mirthless smile. "Tucayan, Senor, has left an evil flavor in the mouth, and the blood of many Spaniards will be required to wash it out." He transfixed me with an accusing eye. "Who sent you here?"

"Manuel," said I.

He gasped. "You say Manuel sent you?"

"Aye; the swarthy Manuel, the clever ugly sailor who happens to be that portion of the brain of Bolivar which operates in Caracas."

"Humph," he growled. He considered my horse, and I saw an acquisitive gleam in his black eyes. "A fine horse, Senor."

"Aye; a gift from Manuel."

"He would look well under a colonel, don't you think?"

"Very well, Senor, though, unfortunately, I do not expect to become a colonel."

Now he laughed, but his eyes were cold, and his laughter was not a pleasant thing to hear. "The wings you will soon possess, Senor, will render the use of a poor earthly horse unnecessary."

How I wanted to thrust my fist into that smiling face of his, to discompose the even order of his teeth, to get my fingers . . .

He must have sensed my murderous passion, for he uttered a short command, and two of the llaneros grasped me by the arms. "This officer with the bandaged head whose safety seemed so precious a thing to you, Senor, you do not tell me who he is."

"The Dauphin will do as well as anyone," said I.

"Very well; one life is little enough to spend to save the Dauphin. I congratulate you. The sun, Senor, is just coming over the rocky crest of yonder mountain—an excellent time indeed. You may view it as you die. It is more than many a poor Venezuelan has been permitted to do."

The soldiers must have anticipated the wishes of their colonel, for a squad of eight swung into line between us and the sun, turned to face me, grounded their guns, and waited.

Claim Persimmon Tree Native of New England

It is not generally known that the persimmon tree is a native of New England, having been found apparently wild in Rhode Island and Connecticut. It is much better known and more beautiful down south, where it is an orchard tree.

Unfortunately it is not hardy enough around Boston to produce the fruit, although it is fairly common here and prized for its leafage and flowers. It is looked upon as one of the most promising of American native trees as a subject for experimentation and improvement.

"The wood of the American persimmon is hard and close grained, and the so-called heartwood, which is so slow in forming that a hundred years may pass before it is definitely developed, becomes almost black in old individuals," says J. G. Black in the Arnold Arboretum bulletin. "It is from trees of this genus, which is known to include from 175 to 200 named species, that the ebony of commerce is derived, particularly from the variety found in Indian and Ceylon and in the Dutch East Indies."

The persimmon in the north, here in America, often passes unnoticed among many other trees of different families, but with somewhat similar foliage. The bark is dark gray or brown tinged with red, and is deeply divided into thick, square plates.—Boston Globe.

BRITON SEEMS TO HAVE LOST "GRIP"

No Longer Feels Urge to Settle New Lands.

A hundred years or more ago Englishmen were swarming to every corner of the earth, taking over and populating vast stretches of new land, until it was possible—as indeed it may still be possible—to say that there were more English-speaking peoples than there were those of any other tongue.

In the last generation or two there has been a change. Britain still controls much of the vast areas of the earth. But Englishmen are no longer filling them up. Australia, despite its continental extent, remains a sparsely populated land, with most of the people concentrated in a few cities along the eastern coast. England proper teems with men and women unable to find work to do, but the old urge to get out and try what a new country can offer is gone.

Officialdom, in both the motherland and in the colonies, seeks to revive the old swarming spirit. But with small success. The story published in the morning papers is typical. Nearly 100,000 Englishmen who had been persuaded to move to Australia have petitioned the British government to repatriate them. They charge that they were induced to leave their homes by "mischievous, misleading and untruthful propaganda" circulated by paid agents of the Australian government and they tell a sad story of disappointment, starvation and despair. What is probably more suggestive, they tell also that many of their numbers have become mentally deranged and that suicide is frequent.

On this point Warren S. Thompson, in his famous book, "Danger Spots in World Population," has a stimulating discussion. At certain periods in their history nations tend to "swarm," like bees, and "the facts seem to show that only 'swarming' agriculturalists with a rather low standard of living can actually settle a new land." But an industrialized people, such as the English have become, gradually ceases to swarm. It ceases to be able to settle and develop new lands, for the city life to which it has become accustomed renders it unfit to master the soil. Such people, says Thompson, "can exploit certain of its accumulated resources, but . . . they are like the people of the fabled island who lived by taking in one another's washings."

The troubles the expatriated Englishmen are having in Australia and the similar troubles some of their fellows have had in Canada are simply cases in point. If the new lands nominally under the control of the British empire are soon to be filled, it will probably be with other folk than Englishmen from the industrialized mother country.—Baltimore Evening Sun.

Japanese "Pearl Farms" Prove Good Investment

By leasing about 40,000 acres of warm salt water in various bays along the shores of Japan, planting 3,000,000 small oysters—known scientifically as magaritifera martensi—each year, performing a major surgical operation on each of them, then nursing the patients tenderly for seven years, an average of $2,000,000 worth of Japanese culture pearls is produced for world markets annually.

The originator and controlling factor in this strange industry is Kochichi Mikimoto, known as the "pearl king" of Japan. For 23 years he operated nine pearl farms before raising a profitable crop. Now, though by means of the scientific methods he developed, he and his thousand assistants care for 7,000,000 pearl oysters constantly, and the raising of culture pearls has ceased to be an experiment, writes Earl Chaplin May in Popular Science Monthly.

All pearls are produced by irritated oysters. A wild, natural or virgin pearl results when a bit of sand, a minute crustacean or some other tiny foreign substance accidentally gets into the oyster's body. If it is not able to eject the intruder, the oyster surrounds it with layers of a substance which, in time, becomes a pearl. The great value of natural pearls is due chiefly to the fact that relatively few of them are of profitable size and quality.

In the comparatively warm sea water of the Mikimoto pearl farms millions of small oysters, hatched naturally, but under a certain amount of supervision, float for a while and then attach themselves to small stones strewn on the bottom. There they remain for three years. Then Japanese diving girls go down and get them.

Scientists Happy

Scientists of the nation are finding their "happy hunting ground" in the Great Smoky mountains, soon to become a national park. The Great Smokies constitute one of the best laboratories for scientific research in the nation because of their primitive nature, scientists say. Establishment of the national park gives assurance of the preservation of this condition. More than 300 small mammals were collected in 1931 by a group of Chicago scientists who have visited the area regularly since 1927. In all, 18 species and subspecies were collected.

Bees Made Cough Mixture

A colony of bees—three hives—kept by a farmer in the neighborhood of Campbeltown, Scotland, last summer made their cells and cell covers of a mixture of tar and wax, the former, which they collected on the main road near at hand, predominating. As might be expected, the honey in the three hives was impregnated with tar, but the bees were not in any way affected by feeding on a mixture of tar and honey. Coal tar contains among other things, saccharine, the natural food of bees. This is vouched for by Doctor Morrison in a letter to Country Life.

March to the Arctics

Summer excursions to the Arctic regions by airplane and dirigible are promised for the near future, but it will not be so long before the automobile tourist will be able to make his way to Alaska with good roads all the way. The distance between Seattle and Fairbanks is a trifle more than 2,200 miles, and at the present time there are stretches of good roads for nearly 1,000 miles, so that there are comparatively small portions yet to be constructed.

THE MACHINE AGE APPLIED TO CRIME

USE by criminals of modern technological developments such as automobiles, machine guns and airplanes have given them advantages which old-fashioned local and disconnected police systems are powerless to combat and the situation demands the broader modern protection of State police systems, James E. Baum, deputy manager American Bankers Association in charge of its crime investigating department, declares in the protective section of the American Bankers Association Journal.

"The Association's Protective Committee has repeatedly urged the advantages of extending state police systems beyond the nine eastern States which have enjoyed this protection for many years," Mr. Baum says. "The time has passed when we can safely rely upon the disconnected and oftentimes ineffective methods of local and county police. The advent of automobiles and better roads, to say nothing of machine guns and airplanes, demands the same wide latitude in authority and field of operation be given the police no less than the criminal."

Statewide Police Plans Best

He quotes a Kansas judge as saying that "our system of sheriffs and constables was not designed to meet present-day conditions. As a system of law enforcement, it is as out of date as old common-law pleading, both evolved about the same time. The semi-military, highly trained State police officer owing allegiance only to State laws, is the most effective agency for order yet brought forth."

"Every year the robbery experience of banks in the nine States having State police proves the merits and urgent need of State-wide police protection," says Mr. Baum. "Last year, for example, there were 38 bank holdups in Connecticut, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island and West Virginia where State police forces are operated," he continues. "Although this total is exceptionally high due to an unprecedented number of robberies in New Jersey and Pennsylvania, it is little more than half the number of daylight bank robberies suffered in 1930 in Illinois alone. Furthermore, this total of 38 robberies in the nine eastern States was exceeded in California, where there were 42 bank holdups, and in Ohio where banks suffered 40 similar attacks.

Holdups Fewer Under New Plan

"If we extend the comparison of the robbery experience in these States enjoying State-wide police protection to the record in eight central and far western States, we find a total of 304 bank holdups in the latter group. The odds, therefore, continue to be not less than 8 to 1 against the banks in these western States, where they are denied the speedy, coordinated action of State police and their modern means of transportation and communication. The same comparison holds true of the farmers' losses through robberies of livestock, poultry, produce, etc.

"Moreover, these State police forces invariably yield an operating profit in the amount of fines collected and the value of stolen property recovered. Bankers interested in cutting down the cost of robbery insurance might well consider this job of extending State police systems as a timely, co-operative service to be undertaken alongside the farmers."

Sugar Beet Plant Closes

The East Grand Forks plant of the American Beet Sugar Co., closed manufacturing operations of the 1931 season just recently after producing more than 45,000,000 pounds of sugar from 165,000 tons of beets, according to the manager of the plant.

The factory will retain a crew of about 25 men, however, to repair machinery before the 1932 season opens next fall.

Approximately 150 men were released from the company's employ by the closing of the plant. The manager said employment conditions would be effected less than it was apparent because of the closing, since many are persons who live on farms or have other occupations the rest of the year.

The plant was in operation 24 hours a day from September 19 until Dec. 24. The nature of the manufacturing methods made it necessary to keep the plant in constant operation. An average of 1,760 tons of beets a day were consumed and the average daily production was approximately 4,500 hundred-pound bags of sugar.

Marketing of the sugar produced by the plant will continue throughout the period the factory is closed.

Checks amounting to $320,000, the entire sum contracted for sugar beets grown in the Red River Valley this year were mailed to farmers.

Although no accurate figures can be gained it was estimated that the average yield per acre this year was 8.29 tons.

The most important figures available, however, are that the sugar content of beets ground up this year were 1.61 per cent higher than the total average for last year. This year the content is 16.6 per cent and in 1930 it was 14.99 per cent. The remainder is largely water and a small amount of pulp. The pulp, considered high in food value, is sold to farmers for stock feed.

We always appreciate your sending in news items.

The New Year

To the home folks, this home bank extends its best wishes for 1932.

The year 1931 has been a tough one for many of you, but do not forget that the foundation of prosperity in this our home community is just as solid as ever.

We are passing through a most unusual condition, but with courage and faith, aided by thrift and saving our community, fundamentally sound as we know it to be, will come out of the experience stronger than ever. Of that, we hage faith to believe.

So, let us co-operate in 1932 to help bring this change to pass. It will mean more than happiness and satisfaction. It will re-establish business and bring general prosperity.

We pledge our help.

STUDIO VISITS WITH TWINKLING STARS IN RADIO FIRMAMENT

Modern small-town life is being portrayed in Friendship Town, a new program series inaugurated over an NBC-WJZ coast-to-coast network. An all-star cast, including Edwin Whitney, Don Carney, Pick Malone and Pat Pagett, blackface comedians; Virginia Gardiner; Edith Spencer and Harry Salter's orchestra depict the various characters making up the country village of today. There are scenes in the drug store; the academy of music, upstairs; the garage; opera house and other local points of interest in Friendship Town. Local politics play a large part in the general theme, with love interest supplied by a pair of young sweethearts. Vocal selections are provided weekly by Frank Luther, tenor star.

Marcella Shields, who plays varied roles, is proud of a naive tribute to her ability as a delineator of children. Following a recent broadcast in which the former vaudeville actress played a little girl, she received dozens of letters from children who thought she really was a child.

A soldier who has been in the United States Veterans' hospital since the World war recently wrote to Elaine Page, fashion expert on the Woman's Radio Review, for instructions for crocheting a scarf described in one of her broadcasts. The veteran explained he could stick to knitting like many of his comrades, but he preferred to do something different.

Frank Crumit and Julia Sanderson, dropped in on Rudy Vallee at the Pennsylvania Grill recently. Vallee suddenly broke into his routine, and called on Crumit to sing his "Gay Caballero." Frank got up, cleared his throat, hesitated, and had to admit that at the moment he could not remember the words of one of the most famous of the songs written by none other than Mr. Frank Crumit. Some quick prompting by Miss Sanderson saved the day.

THE STORY

In New Orleans, in 1821, Loren Garde, recently an officer under General Jackson, is surprised by the appearance, in ancient Spanish costume of two men and a woman whose beauty enchants him. Resenting the arrogance of the elder of the two men, Garde fights with him and wounds him. He learns his opponent is Adolfo de Fuentes, colonel in the Spanish army in Venezuela. Garde overhears a plot to overthrow Spanish rule in Venezuela. Discovered, he fights, but is overpowered and made prisoner on the Santa Lucrecia, ship bearing arms for the Venezuelans. On board are the conspirators, the lady of his love, her brother Polito, and De Fuentes. From the girl, Garde learns her name is Dulce Lamartina. He loves her, but does not reveal his love. The vessel is wrecked. Garde reaches the Venezuelan shore, alone. He encounters a stranger and sees Dulce. The stranger, Captain Monahan of the British legion under Bolivar, directs him to friends in Caracas. There, supplied by Monahan with the secret sign of the patriots, he is welcomed at the revolutionary headquarters. Garde attends the wedding of Dulce and De Fuentes. Dulce recognizes him and leaves De Fuentes at the altar. She is torn from Garde's arms. He escapes. Finding Garde, Dulce tells him her wedding to De Fuentes was to have been the price of Garde's life. They reveal their mutual love. Garde is made prisoner. From De Fuentes he learns Dulce has disappeared. He is rescued from prison by a revolutionist, Manuel, and with Polito sets out for Bolivar's camp. They are intercepted by Venezuelan soldiers. Garde discovers his companion of the night has been Dulce, and is dismayed by his lack of perception. Dulce escapes, but Garde is seized.

I had seen so much of violence and of death since landing in this unhappy country that, already, I had become hardened, calloused, so that I seemed to be only an onlooker in this, my own execution; and I found myself taking very little interest in it. I found one principal regret; that I had come so near to love's fulfillment—and had failed. Yet I had taken her away from De Fuentes . . . . and she had put her life into my hands. I smiled at the thought of her masquerade. Had I penetrated her disguise earlier how beautiful that silver night would have been. Well, I had won a portion of her love; I hugged that consolation to my heart as the cynical colonel gave a crisp order that caused the two Indians to release me and to stand clear so an errant bullet might not find them.

"I am ready, Senor," said I.

"I want you to know," he said slowly, his eyes upon the fine bay horse that had carried me from Caracas, "that I believe every word you have told me. I believe you are Loren Garde, an American, and that you have come to offer service to General Bolivar. I believe Manuel sent you here, and that he furnished the mount for you; but your own act in permitting—aye, aiding—the Spanish officer to escape condemns you. It makes no difference who he is, if he is a Spanish officer your life is forfeit. The men of Bolivar must be made of sterner stuff. I am sure his excellency himself would never condone such an act. If there is something you wish to say . . .

A few loiterers had gathered to watch the execution, and one, a tall commanding figure that seemed familiar, disengaged itself from the group.

"Francisco," I cried, "Francisco Perez . . . Aqui!" Though I had fought the scheming patriot at every turn, I was sure he stood my friend.

"Who is it?" he asked.

"It is I, Garde—San Isidro. Don't you remember me? I was on the Santa Lucrecia, and in New Orleans. I have dyed my hair."

Francisco strode forward, a half-smile softening the grim lines of his face. He held up his hand. "Wait, Colonel Pini," he said; "I know this man."

Colonel Pini scowled. "What of it, Francisco; has he not—?"

"Yes, my colonel, he has committed a grave offense, and he should pay with his life, but I would talk to him first. If he is from Manuel he might have things to tell us. He is an Americano, who has merely followed the lure of a lovely lady."

"Does the lady, then, bring him here?"

"No," said I, for I had brought the lady.

"Did the lady send the Spanish officer with you?" Colonel Pini laughed. "This Dauphin, whose safety—?"

"No, Colonel; my companion was the Senorita Dulce Lamartina."

"Mother of G—d!" Francisco gasped, and Pini's high laughter beat out over the hills.

"A builder of fairy tales," said Pini. "Could the Americano have entered Caracas, and ridden away with the lady whom Fuentes intended to marry? Can you believe so wild a story?"

I waited.

"My colonel," said Francisco at last, "this young Americano is not the type of man who lies easily, though the tale is hardly credible. If he has sent back to safety the lady whom he followed to Caracas, he must have had good reasons for so doing. Why the crafty Manuel has directed them to the lines of the revolution we do not know, nor can we question Manuel, who enjoys the faith and the love of Bolivar. I think, therefore, the safest move will be to take him to the general, who, hearing his story, will decide his fate."

Colonel Pini smiled. "Very well, Francisco, but if Bolivar approves his execution the horse is mine—remember."

"I shall not forget," Francisco said. "And if the great Simon does not approve I fear for thee, my colonel, because the Viking nurses a healthy hatred!"

CHAPTER VII

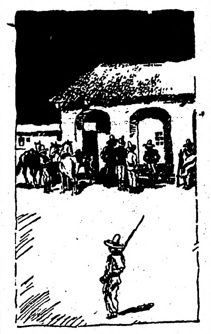
Simon Bolivar

As the three of us rode slowly down the beach toward Camatagua, where Bolivar had his headquarters, I gave to Francisco an account of all that had befallen since the waves had cast me into the jungle. The sun was high when we approached at last the insignificant town of Camatagua, which, because of the presence of the Liberator, had assumed an aspect of great importance.

Bolivar had become, in my imagination, a sort of superhuman influence, a mortal barrier-reef upon which the attacks of Spain had broken and spent their force. I wondered what manner of man he was, this being to whom the eyes of Venezuela were turned in fervent hope, for whose safety and success prayers had been offered up in many thousands of humble homes, whose ranks were filled with patriots eager to spend their lives in his service, and who has been called, by our own brilliant Henry Clay, the "Washington of South America."

"There he is!" Francisco cried.

Before us lay a spacious, brown rock house with red-tiled roof and pillared porch, the home, no doubt, of some prosperous Spanish planter. The Liberator—a tiny figure indeed—stood beside one of the massive stone columns. Just why I had expected to find a person of enormous size I do not know, unless it be that I could not imagine so many units of greatness, so many talents, in a man of normal proportions.



He Radiated a Vibrant Sort of Energy That Seemed to Deaden My Faculties.

"Is that Bolivar?" I asked. And I had come to offer service to this man!

Francisco smiled at the evident concern in my voice. "The bullfrog, my young Garde, judges one by the length of one's hop, or the resonance of one's voice, for the bullfrog only hops, or sings. The giant mind, my friend, may not seek the body of a giant."

"Too true, Francisco," I agreed, "for, had I exercised my muscles less and my brain more I should not have spent my life in foolish blunderings."

Dismounting, I walked between the republican officers toward the house, and Bolivar descended the two rock steps and stood, waiting, on the flagstones.

They released my arms, and I offered unconscious salute. His keen black eyes went over me in swift scrutiny. He radiated a vibrant sort of energy that seemed to deaden my faculties.

At last he spoke, and I noticed that his voice, though a trifle harsh, was musical: "It would seem, Pini, that the soldiers of Spain are improving."

"Aye, General," said Colonel Pini.

He considered my awkward height and, I suspect, the comfortable breadth of my shoulders, then he turned to Francisco: "If we had a thousand like that . . .?"

"Exactly what I have said to him, Excellency," replied Francisco.

Bolivar sighed, and Colonel Pini began the tale of my misadventure, which lost nothing in the telling. As I had only to wait I studied the man who was to be my judge, the man whom South America now calls the greatest military genius of the ages.

Gen. Simon Bolivar was slim, with narrow chest and a spare body. His legs were too thin for the grenadier boots that he wore. His hands were tiny, and his teeth were white and well formed. His hair was black, his skin sallow, and his eyes were a piercing black. His head was very large, and his nose, like the nose of able men, was long. There was a calmness about him that might have been considered mental and physical repose, or it may have been complete control; I never knew.

When Pini had finished his story the general, whose eyes showed no hint of friendliness, addressed me: "Who is this Spanish officer, Senor, whose safety seemed so dear a thing to you, whose life you value above your own?"

"Senorita Dulce Lamartina."

Bolivar pinched a long upper lip between thumb and forefinger. "Would she be the lady whom Colonel Adolfo de Fuentes journeyed to New Orleans to meet, and whom he expects to marry?"

"Yes, Excellency."

"May I assume then, that, though you come presumably to offer service to me, you would aid the fiancee of Colonel Fuentes?"

Menace . . . The world seemed suddenly filled with it. I was lost. "Not because she is the fiancee of Colonel Fuentes, Excellency," I essayed a faint smile, "but because she was his fiancee. I had hoped—"

If Bolivar smiled it was so swift a transition that only imagination might have caught it. "In time of war, Senor, may the regard that a soldier bears for a lady be sufficient inducement—?"

"No, Excellency," I admitted. "It is difficult to explain; a sudden terror seized us."

Francisco's clear, incisive voice broke in: "May I speak a word for this man, General, who, because of an overwhelming love for the Senorita Lamartina, has blundered into trouble and out again a dozen times? I have told you about Garde, the young Americano—and Capt. Monahan, I am sure . . . There is Monahan now. He will tell you also."

The red-haired Irish soldier turned at the two stone posts that had once been a gate and approached. It was good to see that freckled, smiling face again. He saluted General Bolivar, then he took my hand in an iron grip. "The Viking!" he cried. "I knew you would come to us, some time. Where's the girl?"

"The girl?"

"Sure; the Senorita Lamartina. Didn't you tell me that you'd bring her?"

I laughed. "So I did, Monahan—and sent her back again."

Monahan turned to Bolivar—whose knowledge of English was limited—and went back to Spanish again: "I met this man on the Maracay road, General, and showed him a way to enter Caracas because, as a rival of Colonel Fuentes, he could help us. I even gave him money. He promised, with typical American boastfulness, that he would not only disarrange the wedding of De Fuentes, but that, when he left the city, he would bring the lady with him."

"He tells us that he did," said Bolivar grimly; "yet the tale that he brings—"

Now Monahan looked at me with wonder in his eyes. "Garde," he gasped, "can such a thing—"

"I did disarrange the wedding," said I, "and the Senorita, disguised as her brother, accompanied me. Why Manuel should have sent her is a thing I cannot fathom, yet I know she desired to leave Caracas. If I cannot find belief—" I shrugged my shoulders hopelessly.

A silence fell upon us, a deep significant silence that was broken suddenly by the swift drumming of a horse's hoofs upon the hard road. The speeding mount came to a sliding halt and a swarthy figure dropped to the ground.

Seek Church's Blessing on All Undertakings

The Slav people throughout the world hold more to religious customs than any of the peoples of western Europe. Many of these beautiful old customs were created and preserved by the Bulgarians during the five centuries under Turkish rule. The people, as a rule, also call upon the clergy to perform a ceremony for what would appear, in western Europe, most trivial things. In addition to the ceremony performed in the case of marriages, births and deaths, the cutting of the first sod and the laying of a foundation for a new house or public building, the opening of a new street, building, public garden, or a factory, etc., without a religious ceremony is considered as an ill omen. Immediately the roof is placed on a new house or building, a cross, blessed by the priest, with a wreath of flowers attached is hoisted and remains until the work is finally completed. In the villages certain ideas are carried to extreme limits, and the parish priest is called upon to perform all sorts of ceremonies, such as blessing the land, prayers for rain, storms and the harvest, etc.—Detroit News.

Scraps of Humor

WRONG IMPRESSION

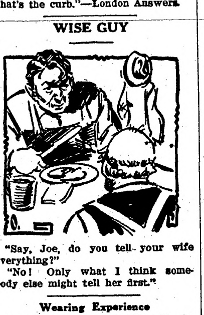
The proud owner of the car offered to take a friend into the country. The offer was accepted, and off they went at a very fair pace. After some time the friend turned to the driver and said: "I say, old man, when do we reach the country?"

"Country?" replied the other. "Why, we're in the country now."

"But hang it all," said the passenger, "all I have seen, is that beastly wall on each side of us for miles."

"Wall, indeed!" said the owner, "that's the curb."—London Answers.

WISE GUY



"Say, Joe, do you tell your wife everything?"

"No! Only what I think somebody else might tell her first."

Wearing Experience

"Oh, well," she said, after a lengthy argument, "please yourself. I suppose you are the one who will wear the clothes."

"Well," observed the husband meekly, "I didn't suppose you'd want to wear the coat and vest."—Tit-Bits.

A Difficult Situation

"A newspaper can make trouble in a home."

"I should say so. What came near causing my first quarrel with my wife was the fact that we had only one newspaper to read and that had the baseball news on one side of the sheet and the fashion news on the other."

The Question

Mr. Bulge—Jane, it seems to me that you are not properly clothed for the reception this evening.

Mrs. Bulge — Goodness gracious! Well—er—where do I need a little more powder, John?—New Bedford Standard.

Two Wishes

"I wish," she sighed, laying down the newspaper, "that we lived in a house where everything is done by touching buttons."

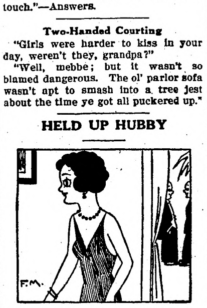
"I wish," sighed her husband, "that I lived in shirts that had buttons to touch."—Answers.

Two-Handed Courting

"Girls were harder to kiss in your day, weren't they, grandpa?"

"Well, mebbe; but it wasn't so blamed dangerous. The ol' parlor sofa wasn't apt to smash into a tree jest about the time ye got all puckered up."

HELD UP HUBBY



"How could she meet the expense of having her face lifted?"

"By doing a little expert lifting herself."

Customer—I want to buy a diamond ring.

Salesman—Yes, sir. May I show you our combination sets of three pieces —engagement, wedding and teething-rings at 10 per cent discount?

Active Brain, Anyway

"So that new girl of yours is lazy."

"Lazy? Why, the other morning I caught her putting popcorn into the pancakes to make them turn over themselves."—New Haven Register.

In Court

"Why so many law books? It is only a $10 dog case."

"My adversary is very profound. You can't try a $10 dog case against him without getting involved in fundamental law."

A Counter Offer

"Will you sign a note for me?" asked the neighbor.

"No," sighed the old man who was hard of hearing. "I can't sing a note. But I'll recite a little poem for you."

Hiccough Remedy

An attack of hiccoughs can be stopped by the use of an ordinary paper bag. Dr. L. A. Golden of Boston has cured cases which have persisted as long as two continuous days. The opening of the bag is held tightly over the patient's mouth and nose. As he breathes, carbon dioxide accumulates and this frequently brings relief. At any rate the treatment can do no harm unless kept up so long that the patient faints from lack of oxygen.—World's Work.

Wisdom of Stevenson

I came upon it the other night again—this paragraph by Robert Louis Stevenson—and copied it down, says a correspondent of the Detroit Free Press. I wonder if it hits you as it always has me.

"Gentleness and cheerfulness—these come before all morality. They are the perfect duties. If your morals make you dreary, depend upon it they are wrong. I do not say 'give them up,' for they may be all you have, but conceal them like a vice, lest they spoil the lives of better and simpler people."

Player Gives New Note to Usual Golf Alibi

There were two things in George Tweep's life that meant everything to him—his family and his golf. It is really difficult to understand how he managed to find time for both. At any rate, his wife and five children complained of no neglect and his golf score averaged around 78.

George had won the right to represent his club in the state golf tournament. During the period preceding the final matches, Mrs. Tweep presented him with a sixth child.

Another man would either have withdrawn from all sports, or would have deserted his family at such a time. George, however, was prepared for the situation. A putting green had been built on the front lawn of his home. Thus he could practice and be near the newest Tweep at the same time.

One afternoon an appreciative gallery came over to watch George do his putting. From all angles, he tapped the ball into the cup—his skill was little short of amazing. At length he decided to try one more and call it a day. It was a simple six-footer, the kind he had been making all afternoon.

He took his stance, held his breath, drew back his putter slowly and brought it forward smoothly. At the moment of impact, from within the house came the disturbing wail of the Tweep infant. George's wrist jerked—the sphere missed the cup by a good three inches!

Forcing a smile, George looked around at the gallery.

"Too bad!" he said. "I guess it's that new bawl!"—Kansas City Star.

A Rembrandt Embellished

Glasgow, Scotland, has a sensation in the report, that the famous picture, "The Man in Armour," by Rembrandt, was found to possess the embellishment of a second artist, who is believed by an expert to have made certain additions to the picture probably 100 years ago. At present the painting is in Holland being "codoctored" for certain cracks, which had appeared in the canvas, and the expert there has reported to the Art Galleries committee of Glasgow corporation that around the figure are traces of the work of a second artist. The value of "The Man in Armour" is estimated at over $500,000. It was once in the possession of Sir Joshua Reynolds.

Grand Rapids—To stimulate the growing of more potatoes to the acre, with a resulting increase in quality, rather than more acres of potatoes, business men of Grand Rapids agreed to give a gold trophy to every farmer in Itasca county who was able to grow more than 300 bushels of potatoes to the acre.

Duluth—Grain storage at elevators in Duluth and Superior is the lightest in more than 10 years this winter, according to records at the Duluth Board of Trade. With lake navigation closed, stocks in the elevators total less than 25,000,000 bushels.

Milaca—Two Milaca school girls, Myrtle Hallberg, 14 and Alice Hallberg, 16, were burned to death and Annie Lamprecht, 19, who tried to rescue them, was burned seriously. Alice poured kerosene into a small stove and the resultant explosion caused the fire.

OLD DUTCH BIBLE FOUND IN DELFT

Discovered by Chance in Church Archives.

Just by chance what is said to be the first Dutch Bible ever printed has been found in the archives of the Delft branch of the Dutch Bible society. It was published at Delft in 1477 by Jacob Jacobssoen and Mauricius Yemantssoen, who came from Middelburg. The volume will be shown at a Bible exhibition to be held at Delft soon. The printer, according to the history of the book, was decapitated for his daring enterprise in producing the book.

The Dutch Bible society has many valuable Bibles in its collection and the Holy Scriptures are regarded here as a sort of providential charter from the days of the great struggle for freedom in the 80 years' war. The so-called Statenbijbel of the Seventeenth century is looked upon as one of the foundations of the Dutch language. The society is just having it translated in a form intelligible to the present generation.

The society itself is more than an institution for the spread of religion. It was founded in 1814, some ten years after the organization of the English Bible society, in commemoration of Holland's liberation from the French in 1813. The Dutch people may be getting less churchly but they are not less religious, and the Dutch Bible society, which has 200 branches in Holland alone and numerous representatives in the overseas part of the kingdom, is still truly a national institution. It does much international work, too, distributing thousands of Bibles, printed in all sizes at prices ranging from 4 cents to $8 and published in 14 European and some 30 Indian languages, for the use of scholars who are sent by the society to live among the natives and study their tongues. There are some 40 native peoples under the rule of Queen Wilhelmina.

The society's methods are very similar to those of the American Bible society. It often sells books at a loss or gives them away to hospitals, hotels, ships, seamen's houses and charitable institutions.

It spreads leaflets in which attention is called to special texts for special cases. It has caused the scriptures to be printed in Braille for the blind and in four millimeter type for the short-sighted.

"I was very much impressed by the candor with which the American society's propagandists are holding their meetings amid the hurrying crowds of New York in such central places as Wall street, laying their Bibles at the heels of Mammon himself," said J. F. Westerman, the Dutch society's representative here. "But the Dutch society also is reaching all social classes. Its work, however, is strictly confined to making Book of Books better known; it does not occupy itself with exegesis and there is no controversial matter in the task of its board, in which various denominations are represented. Even an adherent of the old Catholic church, Professor van den Berg, has a seat on the executive board."

The interest of the Dutch people in the society's work might be livelier, still with about 24,000 members it is fighting its way bravely.—Exchange.

For wise MOTHERS
During these winter days, wise mothers strengthen their children with Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil. It contains Vitamin A in abundance. This helps build up sturdy resistance against colds and against many other common child-ailments. Then there is a wealth of the "sunshine vitamin" (D) in this emulsion that promotes the development of strong bones and teeth—a matter so important in growing children. Pleasantly flavored. Easy for children to take. Scott & Bowne, Bloomfield, N. J. Sales Representatives, Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Inc., New York.

Excellent Maxims for the Conduct of Life

My code of life and conduct is simply this, George Jean Nathan writes, in the Forum and Century: Work hard; play to the allowable limit, disregard equally the good or bad opinion of others; never do a friend a dirty trick; eat and drink what you feel like when you feel like; never grow indignant over anything; trust to tobacco for calm and serenity; bathe twice a day; modify the esthetic philosophy of Croce but slightly with that of Santayana and achieve for oneself a pragmatic sufficiency in the beauty of the esthetic surface of life.

Learn to play at least one musical instrument and then play it only in private; never allow oneself even a passing thought of death; never contradict anyone or seek to prove anything to anyone unless one gets paid for it in cold, hard coin; live the moment to the utmost of its possibilities; treat one's enemies with polite inconsideration; avoid persons who are chronically in need, and be satisfied with life always, but never with oneself.

An infinite belief in the possibilities of oneself, with a coincidental critical assessment and derogation of one's achievements; self-respect combined with a measure of self-surgery; aristocracy of mind combined with democracy of heart; forthrightness with modesty or at least with good manners; dignity with a quiet laugh; honor and honesty and decency—these are the greatest qualities that man can hope to attain. And as one man, my hope is to attain them.

FUNDS FOR HOMES SUPPLIED BY BANKS

By ROME C. STEPHENSON

President American Bankers Association

R. C. STEPHENSON

A LARGE portion of the funds required in home building always has been furnished by banks. They have shown constantly a deep interest in the performance of this feature of national development. Upon it rests much of our country's future stability, and any contribution to its advancement redounds to the advantage of all. So banking has never permitted its co-operative attitude toward home building to lessen.

Practically all banks now accept savings deposits which can well be turned to the advantage of the home builders. The construction of individual dwellings requires a large amount of financing and is a thoroughly commendable enterprise. Necessarily, the aid given to home builders is governed by the sound banking rules which have grown out of the years of experience and the constant studies of bank practices.

All of the efforts made to secure broader real estate loan privileges, to adjust resources to make it possible to lend larger sums for long terms, the standardization of mortgage loan formulas, and the actual lending of vast sums on mortgage notes evidence the desire of banks to contribute a full measure of support to the home-building movement. This is true of all classes of banks, but even in a more marked degree of those whose deposits are largely in the form of savings and whose loans are primarily for building or home purchasing purposes.

Both Sides Protected

The process through which bank loans are made on real estate is as simple as the nature of such an important transaction will permit. When money is advanced the lender must know that repayment will be made the specified time. Likewise the borrower wants to be assured that, after he has figured the loan on the basis of his conservatively anticipated ability to pay, he will not be required to do more, that he will not be disturbed in his efforts to work out of his obligations under those terms. Whether his agreement is to repay the entire loan in three or five years, or on a monthly or yearly basis, he wants the assurance that no additional burdens will be imposed upon him. All of this is settled definitely in advance.

There is no mystery about any of the details, and when the negotiations are complete the borrower knows just what he may expect and what he will be required to do to meet his obligations.

Loans made to persons who wish to acquire homes are not necessarily building loans. One may wish to purchase a home already constructed. In this form of transaction bank loans are used very freely because it is the only kind of a real estate loan some classes of banks may make. Others of course, may lend upon real estate with improvements uncompleted and advance funds as the construction progresses. Different styles in home financing have developed in the various states, and banks have tried to adapt their facilities to the needs. Whatever character of assistance is required in any particular instance usually can be found in some bank in the local community.

Among banks and borrowers for home acquisition purposes a long established and thoroughly tested relationship exists. Banks are not the only agencies through which such funds are available; they do not embody all the spirit of helpfulness which abounds. However, through the years of their co-operation their aid has been of unquestioned value to the home builders whose efforts to establish a permanence for themselves have received constant encouragement. Bankers everywhere are ready to counsel with their customers about their home-building plans and to assist to the extent of their ability. This is being done constantly and the many advantages of it are not without recognition.

Taxes, taxes, taxes, taxes, ta-

This week we all received the glad news about how much our personal property tax was for 1931. The Marshall County State bank has the biggest tax in the village with the Carlson Mercantile and Gunheim next.

Thursday, Jan. 11, 1912 set a record as a cold day in the north with thermometers here sinking way down to 52 degrees below zero. Some parts in Canada had 65 below zero.

T. B. Folden made a business trip to Warren.

Mathilda Nordmark died at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Nels Gudvangen at the age of 61 years.

Things were pretty quiet here on account of the cold.

W. C. T. U. To Meet

The W. C. T. U. will meet at the home of Mrs. Laura Fredrickson on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 16.

Ladies Club to Meet

The Ladies Club will meet at the home of Mrs. Geo. Fricker Wednesday evening, Jan. 20th at 8 o'clock. All members are urged to be present.

School Notes

HIGH SCHOOL

A set of twenty-four biographies has been added to our Library. It is entitled "Builders of America," by Clifford Smyth.

We are now studying for the semester tests which are to be given next week.

The Navy Goats are planning an entertainment for the Army Mules to be given at Holt High School on Friday, Jan. 22 at 8 o'clock. The following committees were appointed:

Program Committee: Oscar Nohre, Stilof Anderson, Frederick Voth, Esther Evenson, Ruby Hall.

Cleanup Committee: All Navy Gobs of the male species.

Pearl Doral is back to school again after being absent last week.

Eunice Johnson and Cleo Peterson are practicing the declamations which are to be given at the W.C.T.U. Contest at Warren some time in January. The exact date has not been set.

6th, 7th & 8th GRADES

Glenn Carlson started school again after the Christmas holidays.

Bernice Kolden and Lorraine Engebretson are making up the program for the next Little Citizens League program.

The seventh grade Geography class has started the study of Australia.

3rd, 4th & 5th GRADES

The third grade, having completed the study of Shepherd Life, are finishing their booklets on wool.

In art class in our room each child is working on a booklet called "Winter Sports." The fifth grade will include a poem cycle in their booklets.

1st & 2nd GRADES

The first grade have finished the moons for our border so it is now up. We have a Wynken, Blynken and Nod calendar to go with it.

The first grade are making an Eskimo sand table. We have been studying about Eskimos this week.

For art class we have been doing free hand water color work. We have painted free hand vegetables, flowers, summer and winter scenes. We have also learned which colors are used to make green, purple, and orange.

Last Friday Morris and LeRoy had 100 in Spelling.

So far this week LeRoy and Rubin Ness have been tie in the Arithmetic race. We wonder if someone isn't going to get ahead of them.

Russell made us all enjoy reading class this week with the expression he put into the story, "The Princess and the Golden Ball. We are all striving for more expression.

The New Year

To the home folks, this home bank extends its best wishes for 1932.

The year 1931 has been a tough one for many of you, but do not forget that the foundation of prosperity in this our home community is just as solid as ever.

We are passing through a most unusual condition, but with courage and faith, aided by thrift and saving our community, fundamentally sound as we know it to be, will come out of the experience stronger than ever. Of that, we hage faith to believe.

So, let us co-operate in 1932 to help bring this change to pass. It will mean more than happiness and satisfaction. It will re-establish business and bring general prosperity.

We pledge our help.

Mercolized Wax Keeps Skin Young

Get an ounce and use as directed. Fine particles of aged skin peel off until all defects such as pimples, liver spots, tan and freckles disappear. Skin is then soft and velvety. Your face looks years younger. Mercolized Wax brings out the hidden beauty of your skin. To remove wrinkles use one ounce Powdered Saxolite dissolved in one-half pint witch hazel. At drug stores.

Machine to Prevent Erosion

In some parts of this country a great deal of land is lost by erosion. Valuable top soil is washed away by rainstorms, leaving worthless soil which cannot be utilized for any purpose whatever. This loss is frequently very serious, for in the course of time an entire field may be affected. Government scientists have been giving the matter some attention and have developed a machine which is said to overcome the action of the elements. It is a plow with several shovel-like blades with an alternating vertical motion, and as it passes over the ground it leaves a series of small hills and hollows. The water is held and allowed to sink into the ground instead of passing over it and carrying the soil with it.

Rheumatic Pains Relieved this Quick Way

If stabbing pains shoot across your back and cripple you, rub on good old St. Jacobs Oil. Relief comes before you can count 60!... Relief without burning or blistering. This famous oil simply draws out inflammation and pain. It is soothing, healing. For the aches and pains of Rheumatism, Neuritis, Lumbago, Neuralgia or Backache there's nothing so quick or sure to bring relief. Get a small bottle of St. Jacobs Oil from your druggist.

Work for Greater Navy

The navy league is an organization of civilians particularly interested in naval matters. Soon after the ratification of the London naval treaty of 1930 the Navy league stated its consequent policy to be "the carrying out of an orderly naval building and replacement program within the time limits of the treaty, as well as within its restrictions, along such lines as may economically and efficiently serve the interests of the United States."

Rockets Rout Wolves

Meeting two wolves on a lonely road near Pampilhoa, Portugal, M. Da Serra routed them with rockets which he was taking to a fair. Brandishing of his cane did not affect the animals, which prepared to attack him. Lighting the rockets Da Serra shot the balls toward the wolves, which fled in dismay.

THE STORY

In New Orleans, in 1821, Loren Garde, recently an officer under General Jackson, is surprised by the appearance, in ancient Spanish costume of two men and a woman whose beauty enchants him. Resenting the arrogance of the elder of the two men, Garde fights with him and wounds him. He learns his opponent is Adolfo de Fuentes, colonel in the Spanish army in Venezuela. Garde overhears a plot to overthrow Spanish rule in Venezuela. Discovered, he fights, but is overpowered and made prisoner on the Santa Lucrecia, ship bearing arms for the Venezuelans. On board are the conspirators, the lady of his love, her brother Polito, and De Fuentes. From the girl, Garde learns her name is Dulce Lamartina. He loves her, but does not reveal his love. The vessel is wrecked. Garde reaches the Venezuelan shore, alone. He encounters a stranger and sees Dulce. The stranger, Captain Monahan of the British legion under Bolivar, directs him to friends in Caracas. There, supplied by Monahan with the secret sign of the patriots, he is welcomed at the revolutionary headquarters. Garde attends the wedding of Dulce and De Fuentes. Dulce recognizes him and leaves De Fuentes at the altar. She is torn from Garde's arms. He escapes. Finding Garde, Dulce tells him her wedding to De Fuentes was to have been the price of Garde's life. They reveal their mutual love. Garde is made prisoner. From De Fuentes he learns Dulce has disappeared. He is rescued from prison by a revolutionist, Manuel, and with Polito sets out for Bolivar's camp. They are intercepted by Venezuelan soldiers. Garde discovers his companion of the night has been Dulce, and is dismayed by his lack of perception. Dulce escapes, but Garde is seized. His captor is Colonel Pini. Garde is brought before Bolivar.

"Manuel rides a horse as well as he does a ship," said Francisco, relief in his dark eyes.

"Aye, friend of mine," I whispered, "he is most opportune." For I felt that Manuel would save me.

The sailor pushed through the crowd of curious Indians who had gathered to look upon the great general, and Bolivar, striding forward to meet him, threw his arms around the broad shoulders. "My ugly angel," he cried, deep affection in his voice, "I have not seen thee for months! What brings thee in such haste from Caracas?"

Manuel grinned at the rest of us. "Caracas, General, is boiling." His dancing eyes considered me. "Where is the Senorita?"

"Aye," said Monahan laughing, "did he not boast—?"

"The next man who asks me about the Senorita, Manuel, shall feel the weight of my fist."

The sailor's keen insight read the menace in the air. "This man, general, belongs to us, he is one of us."

"Yet he comes in the garb of Spain."

"A garb that I myself procured. You should have seen me." He laughed. "I am perched like a rooster, on the comb of a roof in the moonlight, a piece of heavy tiling in my hand, waiting for a tall Spanish officer to pass beneath me. I was amazed to discover that Caracas is filled with short fat officers." He stopped to laugh again. "Finally one, a captain, approached. Upon his head I deposited the piece of tiling, and upon his flattened body I deposited myself. In two minutes he was minus the uniform the Americano now wears, which, in truth, is grievously inadequate."

Bolivar laughed, a rich, ringing laugh that meant life to me. "And the city," he said, "is boiling because of that? What more?"

"There is little more, General. The beautiful Senorita Lamartina is lost, and all the forces of Caracas have failed to find her. My part of the escapade of the Americano—who has aided us tremendously, and who comes to offer service to our cause—was too evident, so further stay in the city was impossible. Lastly, La Torre plans a move against the armies of Your Excellency."

"It is good news, Manuel, for we shall be ready." Bolivar considered a long moment. "What of the Spanish officer who rode last night with this Americano?"

"There was no Spanish officer, General, who rode with him. The resemblance between the Senorita and her brother, Lieutenant Polito, is a very striking thing."

"You mean to tell us, Manuel, that she—?"

"Aye, General." The swarthy sailor laughed. "She used Polito's broken head, and his cold, and the all-enveloping cloak to hide her identity; and she rides a horse as well as anyone."

Bolivar smiled. "Yet the tale that he brought us was so impossible."

I turned to the Liberator: "If His Excellency, having forgiven me, cares to make use of a stupid clod I would offer service to him. I can, at least, furnish a man's portion of brawn."

Now Bolivar took me by the hand and smiled into my eyes. "Francisco has told me much of you. If Andrew Jackson has looked upon you with favor—"

Francisco interrupted. "I have the proof, Excellency, here in my pocket." He drew out the thin leathern wallet that had been in my possession when I had played so poorly the part of San Isidro. In that wallet I had carried, since a few days after the battle of Chalmette, a piece of paper torn from the fly-leaf of my French grammar, upon which Gen. Andrew Jackson had written a statement the night he had stayed at my father's house; a statement, which, worthless in itself, has been my dearest possession. "May I read, Excellency, what I have found in the wallet of young Garde?"

Bolivar turned to me. "Aye, Excellency, if it will make of me a soldier under your banner."

So Francisco, bearing in mind the general's limited knowledge of English, read it very slowly:

"Major Loren Garde has offered valiant service to his country; he has fought with conspicuous gallantry at Talladega, at Horseshoe Bend, at Pensacola, and at Chalmette. A worthy son of a worthy soldier father."

"It is signed, Excellency," Francisco said, "'Andrew Jackson.'"

"One could not have come to me," said Bolivar, "more highly recommended. If General Jackson has seen fit to commission you a major, surely I can do no less."

"But, Excellency," I cried, "it is too much—it is more than I deserve. I cannot hope—"

"It shall be done, Major; Francisco has said you will make a good soldier, and Francisco's judgment is never at fault."

Such was my first meeting with the Liberator, to whom half of South America owes its independence, and all of the western world offers homage.

Intuition told me that Pini would never be my friend, a contingency which worried me not at all.

* * * * * * *

The weeks that followed my first meeting with General Bolivar were busy weeks indeed, for La Torre was massing the forces of Spain to break the ever tightening republican lines, and the Liberator moved to meet him.

My days, filled with feverish activity, went by, and quiet nights under the stars were given over to worship at the shrine of Love, for the face of Dulce was ever before me. She semed to be calling, calling, and I have awakened—crying out her name —from dreams that were so real I could almost have touched her. And, because of the desperation of my love, I became a better soldier, knowing that this nightmare of murder—as she called it—would be over only when Bolivar had won, for he was not a man to stop short of victory. Then I could seek her out.

I met, during those days, Gen. Daniel O'Leary, Irish soldier and outstanding figure of the British legion, to whom Venezuela today renders homage; Moore, Bolivar's doctor, a vivacious English gentleman; Marino, his chief of staff, Gen. Belford Wilson, veteran, and son of Sir Robert Wilson of Peninsular fame; Paez, chief of the llaneros, and later President of Venezuela more than once, and Cedeno, Bermudez, Plaza and Urdaneta. The high-sounding rank and titles that they carried took the place of pay they didn't receive.

Under us were English, Irish, Portuguese, negroes, half-breeds, Indians, lean llaneros, the mixed riffraff of cities, and a few American adventurers from the States. A motley crowd indeed, and hardly one that a man might pick to win an empire, yet the genius of Bolivar won them over, touched them with the divine spark of patriotism, and made of this composite crew an army that finally crushed the power of Spain in Venezuela.

One mild May morning, as the sun stood an hour above the heights of San Casimiro, we broke through the Carabobo hills and descended upon the little city of Cura. Having no garrison it fell readily into our hands, then we deployed, east and west and north, to invest the town of Maracay, for that was our goal, that the first long stride in the race for Puerto Cabello. I remembered well the last words of Bolivar to him who commanded the center of our attacking lines. He had embraced our colonel and had said, "Remember, Pini, we take the town of Maracay—and hold it." And Colonel Pini, had saluted, proud of this glorious mission, for Pini, however much he may have failed, had no lack of courage.

On the broad fertile valley that lies to the east of Lake Valencia we met the enemy; Paez, east of us, and Plaza, to the west, attacking at the same time. The history of Venezuela calls this battle only a skirmish, for it failed of its goal because the body cannot go forward if the wings are dragging. In our unit were two hundred of the British legion and over four hundred Indians, and despite the dragging wings, we pushed onward until we touched the town, which, after an hour of fiercely contested fighting, fell.

Our Indian soldiers, out of hand with joy over this hard-won victory, ran, yelling and shooting, through the narrow streets. In an hour they had found wine and rum, and other drinks to satisfy them, and so became, at last, more tractable under the commands of their officers.

I had given strict orders to my battalion that no captives, wounded or well, should be murdered, which had been, up to this time, the general procedure in the frightful "war of death" that Morales had inaugurated and that both sides were waging; so squads were roaming over the city, carrying to the nearest available houses wounded men for treatment.

At one of these houses I found Captain Monahan. He was leaning against an adobe wall, hands in the pockets of his tan and gray jacket, noisome pipe tilted at a rakish angle, and idle eyes upon a western sun.

"Why do you stand there," I laughed; "will the poor walls fall if you remove your support?"

"I am waiting," said he, disregarding my levity, "for Colonel Pini to come to his senses."

"Then you have a long wait, my captain, for Pini will never arrive."

"The Lamartina boy is inside." He pointed over his shoulder with an indifferent thumb. "He wants to see you."

"Is he wounded, Monahan?"

"Not much."

"Did he say anything about his—?"

"To me?" The Irishman grinned again. "I'm not chasing moonbeams, Garde, I'm no sighing Romeo; I'm a soldier."

"And a good one, my friend," said I, stooping to pass the portal.

Polito—very pale, very frail—lay upon a crude bed of straw. His eyes lighted up when he saw me, and as he raised a left hand, I assumed that his right was useless. "The—the moonwraith," he said.

I opened his jacket, thrust the shirt aside, and found a bullet wound below the collar-bone. "Not so bad," I assured Polito; "it missed the lung, I am certain. You should be out in a month. Who was in command of this sector, Polito?"

"Adolfo." He tried to smile . . . a very sorry effort. "Why did—did you not keep her, Senor, when you had the chance? She rode away from Caracas with you."

"And I sent her back to the lines of Spain, realizing too late that she was not yourself. The revolutionists approached, and her life would have been endangered. My love for her should have seen through so simple a masquerade. I seem always to fail. Did she"—I had some difficulty with my voice—"did she marry Colonel Fuentes?"

"Does she speak of—of me, Polito?"

He nodded. "I think she feels that your regard should have read a mere disguise."

"And so it should, Senor, had I been thinking less of my own affairs. Forgive me, Polito, I am thinking, as usual, only of myself. I shall see that a medico comes to attend you at once."

"I would repay you." He thought a long moment. "You cannot hold the advantage you have gained, Senor, for Paez and Plaza, having failed, will permit our wings to close in upon the city."

I nodded.

"Your lines of communication, once broken . . ."

I nodded again, for I knew then why Monahan awaited the pleasure of Colonel Pini, and I realized the danger of the dilatory tactics of our colonel.

Inheritance Laws Born in Private Ownership

Among our primitive ancestors there were no such things as a will or even inheritance by a limited number of heirs, because there was nothing to inherit or to will. All property was community property. When a man died he simply ceased to use the common property "pool," and without any formalities the surviving members of the group continued to make use of it.

When private ownership of things and land came to be recognized, the governing unit—village, tribe or state —found that it had to take some action when a man died, leaving property. If nothing were done, anyone who happened to be near or strong might seize the ownerless property, even though he were a total stranger to or even an enemy of its former owner. Tribal concepts of fair play came into operation, and it was recognized that the dead man's family should have first claim to his former belongings. From this developed the customs and laws of inheritance which have taken varied, and in some cases, very complex forms, in different parts of the world.—National Geographic Society Bulletin.

Curiosity of Nature

The famous "ice mine" in Pennsylvania is located at Coudersport. It is located on a mountain side and mystifies scientists. The ice does not form from water but because of a peculiar mist coming through the openings, and the hotter the day the faster it forms, until huge icicles appear.

BETTY'S BILL

By CORONA REMINGTON

(© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service)

Big Bill Collingsworth strode up the front steps of the Desmones home with the air of a conquering hero. He gave the door bell a sharp little punch and in a moment Betty herself had opened the door and stood before him, pink and radiant.

"I knew it was you by the way you rang," she said, when they had exchanged the usual greetings. "You have good news, too."

By this time they were walking slowly toward the living room, his arm flung lightly about her shoulder.

"I have," he answered standing stock still. "The greatest news that anyone ever had in this whole world. Get your frills ready, we're going to be married soon."

"Bill!" she exclaimed, giving his hand a little squeeze. "Tell me, do! I can't wait to hear. Let's sit down quick before I fall."

"You know old John Tollman? Mean old devil, but he's got the kale all right. Well, he was in a street car accident not long ago and he's engaged me to take the case and recover damages. Me! Can you believe it. We ought to be able to get married on the fee."

"Bill Collingsworth, you're the greatest lawyer in this whole city full of men. I've always known it and now the world's beginning to find it out," said Betty, looking adoringly at her fiance.

When old Tollman entered Bill Collingsworth's office the next day the young lawyer experienced a sudden revulsion of feeling as his swift glance took in the crabbed old face, the colorless lips, the diamond stickpin and the heavy fur coat of his prospective client.

"Well, young man," he began, throwing off his coat and dropping stiffly into a chair. "I hear you're a smart chap and that's the very kind I'm looking for. This is going to be a hard case, the company will contest it on the grounds that it was my fault, but I'm a good client. I'll do and say what my lawyer tells me." He winked at young Collingsworth and continued, "and I got a bunch o' witnesses who are willing to do the same," he ended laughing loudly and slapping his leg.

"I'm sorry," said Collingsworth rising, his face drawn and white, "but I'm afraid I'm not just the kind of an attorney you need. I don't believe I could handle your case."

"I guess I must have come to the wrong place," snarled Tollman, his jovial manner suddenly gone. "I reckon you ain't a lawyer at all but a Sunday school teacher."

With that he walked out, and a moment later a very sad young man left the office building and made his way to the Desmones home.

"I'm proud of my Bill," said Betty after she had heard the story, "and what do you care? Something better may come along any day."

Disconsolately, he returned to his office. It poured all day and not client came near. The whole week was a nightmare. It seemed as if every one had forgotten him.

After days of silence the jangling of the telephone at his elbow made him start suddenly.

"This is Harrison of the Railway and Light company," said a hearty voice. "Could you come down to my office some time this afternoon?"

"Let's see," he said over the wire. "One o'clock . . . Two . . . I could see you for half an hour from three-thirty to four. Will that do?"

"Fine!" answered Harrison. "I'll expect you then. Goodby."

"Now, what d'you suppose he wants with me?" muttered Collingsworth after he had hung up.

But he could not solve the problem, and it was nearly four o'clock before he found out.

"Heard something about you the other day," said Harrison when greetings were over. 'Somebody told me that you had refused the Tollman case because you didn't think he was using honest methods."

"I didn't say anything of the sort," answered Collingsworth hotly. "I simply refused the case without explanation. My reason for doing so are my own."

"That's all right, son, I understand," soothed the older man. "I just want to tell you that you've got a backbone and I like your business methods. Crookedness may get by for awhile but honesty stands the test of time. Now, I've been enquiring about you and you seem to be a pretty smart young man. Mr. Eckel, our attorney for the past twenty years, is retiring the first of the year and going abroad to live. How'd you like to step into his shoes?"

Collingsworth gripped the arm of his chair and struggled to modify the ecstacy in his voice as he spoke.

"That's the way for a man to talk; no beating around the bush. All right, you can come around the first of the week and we'll fix up the papers."

Collingsworth rose abruptly.

"I have an important engagement," he said blushing.

"All right, young man, you run along and tell her," laughed Harrison, clapping him on the back. "I had just such an engagement once myself."

Intricacies of Kinship Part of Southern Life

Perhaps one of the most characteristic modes of behavior in the South is the business of kinship, in which particular the southerner surpasses even the New Englander, Howard Mumford Jones writes, in Scribner's Magazine. It sometimes seems to me that everybody in Virginia or South Carolina or Georgia is related to everybody else.

If a marriage takes place, the fact is conversationally recorded; then comment turns at once to the question of the family ramifications involved. If a political appointment is announced, it soon appears that the appointee is cousin to somebody else.

The system is so intricate that the tactful northerner, after one or two unhappy blunders, learns to preface any comment on a public character, literary, political, or what not, with the polite hope that the subject's relatives will not misunderstand his remarks.

In a day when the family is supposed to be breaking up, the business of "claiming kin" in the South probably is less patent than it used to be; yet it is one of the most powerful forces in southern life, and one the implications of which, I believe, few southerners realize.

Starting Trouble

He was one of the hatless brigade, but his young wife went to the opposite extreme. Her frequent changes in millinery were, indeed, a source of worry to the impecunious hubby. He lacked courage to tell her so until the national economy blizzard broke loose.

"How do you think we should economize, Harold, love?" she asked.

"Well, Flossie, darling, really, I think we should begin by cutting down our overhead expenses," he answered tactfully.

Then the fun began.

That's No Joke

"A person may lose 40 per cent of his blood and live to tell about it," says a passing item.

Yes, and we have discovered, alas! that some of those who lost 99.9 per cent of their money in the stock crash can live to tell about it—and spend about 99.9 per cent of their time doing it, too.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Money and Disposition

Dora—Not exactly. But I'd want my husband to have a lovely disposition, and if he didn't have money he'd very likely be worried and ill-natured.—Kansas City Star.

Why Suffer Pain from a cut or burn? Cole's Carbolisalve stops pain instantly and heals quickly without a scar. Keep it handy. All druggists, 30c and 60c, or J. W. Cole Co., Rockford, Ill.—Advertisement.

The Helper

Taxi Driver—That is all right, sir. The young lady's father settled all that.—(Die Woche im Bild, Olten).

Bees

They all mean honey for somebody."

Observatory Sites

Several factors are taken into consideration in choosing sites for observatories. A site is chosen where there are a large number of clear nights in the year, where the air is free from dust and haze, where the altitude is high enough for the site to be above part of the air, where a dry climate assures cloudless skies, and where smoke and artificial lights of cities are absent. To this must be added the factor of "good seeing" as opposed to "poor seeing."

British Stand on Palestine

The Balfour declaration made with regard to Palestine as a Jewish homeland was contained in a letter written by Arthur Balfour, then prime minister of England, to Baron Rothschild, in which Mr. Balfour expressed the sentiment: "The government views with favor the establishment of Palestine as a national home for the Jewish people and will use its best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of this object."

Forest Fires

There are three classes of forest fires: Superficial fire, burns leaves of the trees and is not necessarily dangerous; crown fire, burns through the branches and kills them and is very dangerous and disastrous; deep ground fire, burns off the roots deep under the trees and makes a very dangerous fire. In burning land the fire consumes all the rotted leaves and destroys the soil, leaving the mineral element.

Nelson's Great Honor

The Chelengk or Plume of Triumph, a diamond aigrette given by the Sultan of Turkey to Lord Nelson after his victory at the battle of the Nile in 1798, and now the property of the British nation, is the highest insignia of the Mohammedan world. It had never before been awarded to anyone outside Islam.

Use of Bank Checks

The habit of using checks rather than money affects the velocity of circulation of money, because a depositor's surplus money will immediately be put in the bank in return for a right to draw by check. Banks thus offer an outlet for any surplus money—pocket money—and tend to prevent the existence of idle boards.

Postage Stamps Not a Tax

Postage stamps are not a form of taxation. The revenue derived from sale is applied directly to the cost of maintaining the Post Office department and handling the mail.

INDUSTRY SEES HOPEFUL SIGNS, BANKERS TOLD

MOTOR SUPPLY IN HANDS OF PUBLIC FALLING OFF

Twelve Million Years Less Transportation in Nation's Car Inventory Than Considered Normal, Manufacturer Tells Financiers

Estimating that transportation in the form of automobiles now in the hands of the American public is twelve million "car-years" below normal, and that this deficit will eventually have to be made up, Richard H. Grant, vice president of the General Motors Corporation, recently told the American Bankers Association convention that employment in his company may be greater this winter than last year.

"Employment during the winter months is a very important thing," Mr. Grant said. "So far as our corporation is concerned, in November, December, January and February we will be employing at least as many and probably more men than we did this past year."

In order to gauge the outlook for next year's market his corporation, he said, attempts to set up sales indices based on intensive scientific studies in addition to observation and common sense.

"We are in the habit of looking upon an automobile not merely as an automobile but as transportation," he said. "We figure each automobile produced as six years of transportation. Then by following up records of production yearly, we get a graph which indicates what ought to be a normal inventory of transportation in the hands of the American people, and whether there are more or less miles than might be expected. According to our figures, there are about twelve million years less transportation in this inventory at the present time than has been considered normal since 1925.

The Outlook for Business

"Consequently, if we retain the same purchasing power in this country, it is quite evident that on the first upturn of business there will be a rush to replace that inventory. In developing this graph, it has come out very strongly that every third year is a big automobile year. The biggest automobile year was 1929 when 4,100,000 cars were produced for American consumption. This year the industry will produce somewhere between 1,800,000 and 1,900,000 cars. As 1932 is three years after 1929, if economic conditions were normal we could be sure we would do a tremendous business, because the third year is the time when the bulk of the replacing takes place."

He added that there are factors at work that make it uncertain how big the year will be, instancing that "money is being hoarded from lack of confidence and this takes away some purchasing power that we would otherwise have, while family budgets are being cut on account of changes in income conditions, which again means that purchasing power for the automobile, like a good many other things, will be knocked down." As a result, he said, it was necessary to measure what statistically would be a big year against a practical consideration of the curtailment of expenditures which is going on and determine how big the year will be under these circumstances.

"From a long haul standpoint, regardless of how many automobiles are sold in 1932, we are storing up a big business for the future," Mr. Grant said. "There will be fewer automobiles sold in 1931 than will go to the scrap heap. With 12,000,000 car-years out of the inventory, nine percent more gasoline was used up to August 1, 1931, than was used in 1930. With fewer automobiles, the people must have been running them faster and longer to consume the additional gasoline. This means that we have some 22,000,000 people working hard to make a fine business for our industry when there is an economic recovery.

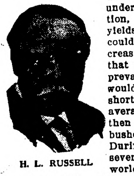
No False Optimism

"I am not attempting to create any false optimism—I am not speaking without a statistical background. Using the best sense we can, we have drawn conclusions from the figures we have, and I am willing to make the statement that as far as the conduct of our business for the first half of 1932 is concerned, we shall set the indices somewhat higher than the actualities of 1931. We are willing to set our advertising budgets and our selling expense on that kind of indices. With economic conditions as they are, and since the obsolescence is so great and we have sunk so low in this year's sales, we figure that the first half of 1932 must necessarily be better than was the first half of 1931."

THE MACHINE AGE SPOILS A PROPHECY

By H. L. RUSSELL

Advisory Council, Agricultural Commission, American Bankers Association



H. L. RUSSELL

A noted British scientist forecast thirty years ago that by 1931 all available wheat land in the world would be under cultivation, and if the yields per acre could not be increased beyond that which then prevailed there would be a world shortage. The average yield then was 12.7 bushels per acre. During the past seven years, the world over, it has been 14.1. On the 320,000,000 acres in cultivation this increase would amount to almost a half billion bushels more production than the world standards of thirty years ago. In place of dire distress due to shortage, we have had distress due to surplus.

Wheat farmers have shown no great inclination to curtail materially their output; perhaps a 10% decline compared with 70% reduction in steel. This unwillingness, or perhaps inability, to adjust production to current needs makes the problem all the harder to solve.

Not only are we now growing more wheat per unit of land, but acreage has been very greatly extended. In twenty years Canada has increased acreage 250%, Australia almost as much. Another significant fact is the materially lessened use of wheat. A much more diversified diet has developed. More vegetables and fruits are used than formerly. The reduction of 1.2 bushels consumed per person per annum since the last generation necessitates nearly 150,000,000 bushels less wheat than was formerly required.

Machines Increase Supply

The factor that has exerted the most potent influence in this rising world flood of grain has been the rapid development of the machine. The old days of the cradle required from thirty to forty hours of hand labor to harvest an acre of grain. Then came the binder, which reduced the process to four or five hours per acre. Now the combine does the work in forty-five minutes per acre.

Where it used to cost ten cents a bushel merely to thresh the grain, the modern combine cuts and threshes at a cost ranging from 3 to 5 cents a bushel. With this reduced cost of production, the possibility of acreage expansion is tremendous. Lands heretofore regarded as worthless except for grazing have recently come into competition with the older wheat belts.

The Russian Effort

Within the past two or three years another disturbing element has come into the picture. Soviet Russia is attempting a comeback fraught with possibility that cannot yet be fully evaluated. Russia is eagerly utilizing the very latest of scientific knowledge to enlarge her agricultural possibilities. With feverish anxiety she is literally pouring millions into the expansion of her university research institutes, experimental stations and breeding farms. Her scientists are combing the earth for new crops and new methods. No country in Europe is manifesting more interest and activity in laying hold of the best science, wherever it may be found.

It is of more than passing interest that the wheat yields reported on the huge trust farm known as the "Giant" ran last year as much as 18 bushels to the acre. On this single farm the crop harvested is reported to have been 3,865,000 bushels. A single farm of 427,000 acres under government control and mechanized as fast as human energy can be applied is a new factor in the world's picture.

There can be but little doubt that the Russian situation may yet assume quite a different attitude from what obtained even in pre-war days.

Bankers Hold Farm Conference

A "feeders' conference" was held in a state bank at Presho, South Dakota, attended by fifty farmers. The conference stressed the feeding of low price wheat and barley, and marketing it through livestock. Later, booklets on the feeding of wheat were distributed among the farmers, and a feeders column was carried in the local paper each week.

"We have had more success with the conference and with the feeders column in the local paper, than with any other undertaking we have tried," the bankers said. "As a result there is about three times as much livestock being fed out in our territory than ever before. We plan to hold other similar conferences the coming year."

The benefits of civilization exist because of the capital accumulated by those who have gone before. Through accumulation of capital our great railroads have been constructed, our public utilities have been built and our mills, office buildings and homes have arisen.

NATION'S FINANCE STANDS TEST WELL

Economic Policy Commission of Bankers Association Points Out How 22,000 Banks Protect Public Interest

Over 22,000 banks all over the United States are "quietly and efficiently serving their communities, helping tide many business enterprises over their difficulties, helping many concerns to earn money, helping create the economic activities that mean payrolls and spending power in their zones of influence, and faithfully keeping guard over the working capital and savings funds of their depositors," the Economic Policy Commission of the American Bankers Association says in a recent survey, adding:

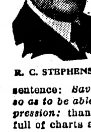
"It surely stands strikingly to the credit of the banking profession that, during a period of unparalleled international economic depression, this vast majority of bankers have so competently, so courageously and so successfully met their difficulties and obligations. The effects of the drought, the demoralization of agriculture, the stagnation of industry, the breakdown of trade, the inability of so many heretofore desirable customers to meet their obligations to the banks, the impairment of public confidence by mob scares and false rumors resulting in unreasoning runs, the abnormal depreciation of quote security values even in the most wisely conceived investment accounts, the utter collapse of real estate values—all these things have occurred on a nationwide and worldwide scale with unprecedented severity.

"The effects of every one of them have assailed the banks with destructive forces because they are of the very essence of a bank's economic substance. Yet, as we have shown, the great bulk of our banking deposits has been protected without harm, and our banks in a vast majority have continued to serve, support and strengthen their customers and their communities with unflagging and unconquered devotion."

WOULD ALTER OUR FINANCIAL HABITS

By ROME C. STEPHENSON

Former President American Bankers Association.



R. C. STEPHENSON

The most constructive action that can be taken toward bringing about greater stability in our business life is the development of a more balanced attitude in the minds of all of our people in regard to the right relationship between saving and spending. There is more practical, workable economics in the sentence: Save during prosperity so as to be able to spend during depression: than in a whole library full of charts and tables and books on political economy.

I do not believe it is an impracticable dream to bring about an era of more intelligent saving and spending on the part of our people. It is not impossible to change the habits of the population. It has been done in many lines. The habits of our people have been improved and the health of the nation promoted in many ways by consistent programs of advertising and education that have brought about better hygienic understanding and practices.

The medical profession has virtually banished the scourge of some diseases by persistent, intelligent campaigns of preventive sanitary measures and inoculations, requiring new understandings, new habits among many millions of our people. Also a large part of this evolution of public health improvement has naturally developed through the intelligent advertising of many products that have to do with bodily care. I refer to the manufacturers and distributers of such things as more healthful shoes, more effective toothbrushes, food products with more wholesome values of nutrition and countless other practical ideas that have become commonplaces of our daily business life,—and that have become a part, too, of the very texture of the personal habits and health of great masses of our people.

If it has been good advertising and good business for so many of our national producers to spend millions of dollars thus to inculcate new habits of personal hygiene and personal care, is it not good business and good advertising for our banking interests to lay similar stress during the next period of prosperity upon better financial habits and customs of our people?

Bankers above all are interested in stable, wholesome business. They have much to gain by a state of sound financial health among the people, and most to lose by epidemics of economic maladies such as have swept the country during the past two years.

Commissioner Rokke offered the following resolution and moved its adoption:

Whereas on June 18, 1926 an appropriation out of Road & Bridge fund in the sum of $300.00 was made to town of Nelson Park to be paid when work set forth in application therefore was completed and it now appearing that said work has been completed it was resolved that said $300.00 be now paid.

Commissioner Bergman seconded the motion and the same being put was carried.

Recommendations of Marshall County Tax Payers Association Committee

1. Reduction of assessed valuation of real estate for 1932 to the extent of 40%.
2. That all Rural Credit owned lands be removed from the assessment records in arriving at total assessed valuation of county, and that a separate record thereof be made and not included in the assessment rolls.
3. That the county business be conducted on a cash basis.
4. That county owned lands be rented on crop share basis.
5. That engineer's force be reduced to such minimum as is consistent with fair service considering work necessary to be done.
6. That all public expenses be kept down as low as possible. That no improvements be made except when absolutely necessary. No new road to be constructed out of tax moneys for at least five years.
7. We are of the opinion that county treasurer and county auditor should accept a voluntary reduction of salary to the sum of $2,000.00 each; and that they interchange their clerical force.
8. We feel that the other county officers are entitled to the salary they now receive.
9. That the salaries of all clerks should be fixed at no greater sum than $90.00 each per month, except deputy county auditor.
10. That no more road machinery be purchased for at least three years.
11. That a purchasing committee consisting of the clerk of court and county attorney be designated; and in all cases where a single expenditure is to exceed $10.00 that the same be first acted upon by the county board.
12. That if in the opinion of the board any of the clerks can be dispensed with and thereby save money we recommend that the same be done.

We recommend that the county co-operate with State and Federal authorities to minimize the prospective grasshopper scourge and expand such money as may become absolutely necessary.

F. A. Green,

GIVE WINTER LAYERS A COMPLETE RATION

For satisfactory winter laying, hens must be fed a complete ration, advises George Ghostley, of Anoka, prominent poultry breeder and hatcheryman, who has been engaged by the agricultural extension division at University Farm to conduct a series of poultry meetings among farmers of 25 counties. By a complete ration, Mr. Ghostley says, is meant everything a hen needs to maintain her bodily nedes and lay heavily. His recommendations follow:

"A dry laying mash containing 20 percent of meat scraps and dry milk together, the rest ground grains, or grains and mill feeds, should be before the hens in hoppers or feeders all the time. If you have skimmilk or buttermilk, use only 10 percent meat scraps and no dry milk in the mash. Three pounds bone meal, 1 pint cod liver oil and three-fourths pound of salt should be added to each 100 pounds of mash. Five pounds of vegetables daily to 100 hens, or alfalfa leaves from the hay mow, are good. If you have no vegetables or alfalfa hay add 5 to 10 percent of alfalfa meal to the mash.

"Ten to 12 pounds of grain daily to 100 Leghorns, or 12 to 14 pounds to 100 hens of the heavier breeds, is about right. Water, oyster shell and grit should be provided."

DAIRYMEN USE SILAGE DURING AUGUST DROUTH

That an unusually large percentage of dairymen fed alfalfa or silage during the late summer is a fact that stands out in the summary report for Minnesota dairy herd improvement associations for August. This report, published by the Agricultural Extension Division at University Farm, shows that 186 of the 1,285 herds in the associations reporting for August, were fed silage, or one in every seven. More than half as many herds, 118, were fed alfalfa.

Ramer Leighton, in charge of Minnesota dairy herd improvement associations, says that the number feeding silage and alfalfa in August is by far the greatest of any period since records have been kept. Many dairymen filled their silos early in August, and have been using the new crop, while some others are using silage left over from last year. One hundred and seventy-three of the herds were fed grain, which is also a somewhat higher proportion than usual for summer.

Members of the cow-testing associations appear to be weeding out their herds more closely than usual, 147 unprofitable cows having been sold during August. The report shows that 79 associations were operating in the state during the month. In the 68 groups reporting, there were 1,285 herds, totaling 21,383 cows.

MANY SCALES INACCURATE

Much produce is weighed inaccurately on the farm because of the mistaken idea that a scale which balances is accurate. Livestock weight supervisors of the U. S. Department of Agriculture say that a scale that balances with the platform empty is not necessarily accurate and may have serious defects. For instance, the weight of both sliding and counterpoise weights of an accurate scale in good condition can be reduced by half, the scale made to balance correctly with the platform empty, and the weights yet be so completely wrong that a 100-pound load will appear to weigh 200 pounds. Errors like this actually occur, if counterpoise weights belonging to one scale are used on another scale designed for a different counterpoise ratio. Similar errors may arise from losing poise parts or having repairs made by inexperienced or unreliable persons. Another reason why scales go wrong is that hay, straw, string, paper and even nests of rats and mice accumulate around the levers. Another thing of equal importance which should be kept in mind is that a scale may also be very sensitive, readily show a pound or less applied on the platform, and yet give weights in error by many pounds.

The addition of superphosphate to manure prevents loss of nitrogen, one of the most valuable fertilizing elements in manure. Manure not properly stored and kept moist will soon lose much of its nitrogen. Superphosphate preserves the nitrogen and adds needed phosphate. The U. S. Department of Agriculture advises adding superphosphate to the manure in the gutters in the barn at the rate of 1 pound a day for each adult animal. If the manure is stored, add it at the rate of 40 to 60 pounds to a ton of manure.

Early Paper Money

In Europe paper to represent money first came into use, apparently, during the Middle Ages when the Jewish financiers of those days reinvented the bills of exchange of Babylonia and recorded them in ink on parchment and paper.

The Bank of St. George at Genoa and the Bank of Venice were the first corporations to use paper money. Their bills were bullion certificates. Because the use of these receipts were so much more convenient than carrying about heavy bags of gold and silver, they became popular with merchants and even circulated at a premium over coin.—Detroit News.

SORE THROAT

FIVE minutes after you rub on Musterole your throat should begin to feel less sore! Continue the treatment once every hour for five hours and you'll be astonished at the relief.

This famous blend of oil of mustard, camphor, menthol and other ingredients brings relief naturally. Musterole gets action because it is a "counter-irritant"—not just a salve—it penetrates and stimulates blood circulation and helps to draw out infection and pain. Used by millions for 20 years. Recommended by doctors and nurses.

To Mothers—Musterole is also made in milder form for babies and small children. Ask for Children's Musterole.

The European Workman

Count Karolyi, about to set off on a lecture tour, said in an interview in New York:

"The way Europe works, in comparison with the way America works—well, I'll tell you a story.

"'Aha,' he said to the mayor, a boyhood friend—'aha, we have come on. What are those statues on the roof of the town hall?'

"'Those are not statues,' said the mayor. 'They are masons.'"

World's Jewish Population

An interesting estimate of the number of Jews in the world has been made by the Jewish Chronicle. According to this account the world has roundly 15,000,000 Jews, their distribution being: Europe, 9,500,000; Asia, 600,000; Africa, 500,000; America, 4,600,000. The number in Australia and other parts of the South is negligible, perhaps 25,000. In all countries the Jews make good citizens and contribute fine artists, musicians, writers, and statesmen.—Montreal Herald.

WHY IT WAS GOOD

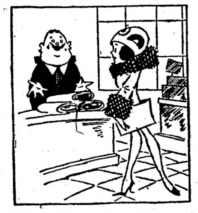
The neighbor gazed critically at it.

"A very fine snapshot indeed," he replied.

"But what makes you think it is a fine snapshot?" asked Bristow.

"Well, you're still on the horse," came the reply.

MATERIAL FOR BABY



Clerk—Did you wish about a yard of this material, madam?

Lady—No, I'll need about three; you see it's not for myself, it's for baby!

Prepared

Mother—Now, Tommy, I'm sure you can eat another cake.

Tommy—No, thank you, mother; I am full up.

Tommy—I can't; they are full up, too.—Macclesfield Times.

Tactless

"Well," said a young lawyer, after hearing a client's story, "your case appears to be good. I think we can secure a verdict without much trouble."

"That's what I told my wife," said the man, "and yet she insisted at first that we ought to engage a first-class lawyer!"—London Star.

Not Bad Business

Mrs. Newbride—Have you any faith in life insurance?

Mrs. Oldbride—Yes, indeed. I've ralized $100,000 from my two husbands, and they weren't especially good ones at that.

Dangerous Pastime

"Mother, I don't want my picture taken."

"Why not, dear?"

"I've been looking at the family album."

Errors of Affluence

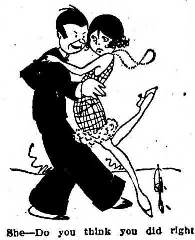
Mrs. Brown—Yes, dearie, that often 'appens to ladies what 'ave got more than one pair.—London Opinion.

HIS TECHNIQUE WON



She—Do you think you did right kissing me?

He—Well, I can't be blamed for my technique. I'm young.

High Cost of Oxygen

"Did you take my advice and sleep with the window open to cure your cold?"

"Yes."

"Did you lose your cold?"

"No, I lost my watch and my pocketbook."—Vart Hem (Stockholm).

Mattresses Come Cheaper

Host—When I was a young man I always said I'd never be satisfied till I'd smothered my wife in diamonds.

Guest—Most laudable. But why in diamonds?—The Humorist (London).

She Wants to Know

"Grace, can you keep a secret?"

"Yes."

"Now I'll blame you if it gets out."

"Hold on, Clara. How many are helping keep this secret?"—Louisville Courier-Journal.

While the Male Sleeps

Wife—John, what is the difference between direct and indirect taxation?

Husband—Why, the difference between your asking me for money and going through my trousers pockets while I'm asleep.

Will Show How Crop Estimates Are Made

Crop Reporting Board Will Take Listeners Behind the Scenes.

Listeners will be taken behind the scenes to hear an explanation of how the government Crop Reporting Board prepares the estimates of crop and live stock production which its members announce regularly in the National Farm and Home Hour when W. F. Callander, chairman of the board, speaks in the Department period of the National Farm and Home Hour on Tuesday, January 12.

Callander will describe graphically how the Board analyzes statistics collected from 300,000 farmers, and from this mass of data makes the monthly estimates which are considered the most authoritative in the world.

For stockmen, a group of three economists will explain the recent course of prices for beef cattle, hogs, and sheep, in the program of Wednesday, January 13.

* * *

The Federal Farm Board will continue its series of talks during 1932 setting forth the progress made in various lines of co-operative organization.

* * *

Future Farmers will hear their special monthly program on Monday, January 11, and on Saturday, January 16, there will be a broadcast of the monthly program by the National Grange.

* * *

Thirty-two measures of music written during the closing announcement of the National Farm and Home Hour, is the speed record of Harry Kogen, director of the Homesteaders orchestra. As the announcer began, Kogen became aware of the fact that two of his violinists did not have the music for the "Homesteaders' Waltz," the closing theme number. Kogen wrote and finished it in the nick of time.

The Future Farmers of America will present their regular monthly broadcast in the National Farm and Home Hour on Monday, January 11, featuring news of Future Farmers activities and talks by their leaders.

Metropolitan Opera Will Be Broadcast

Metropolitan opera went on the air for the first time Christmas Day. It was announced by M. H. Aylesworth, president of the National Broadcasting Company. A weekly series of Saturday afternoon broadcasts from the Metropolitan stage will make portions of scheduled performances regularly available to music lovers here and abroad.

Forgotten HEROES

By

ELMO SCOTT WATSON

Terror of the Natchez Trace

IN THE early thirties many a traveler over the Nashville and Natchez Trace, the principal highway through the Lower Mississippi valley, failed to reach his destination and to his friends came back the fearful word "The Mystic Clan has got him." The Mystic Clan was the product of the cunning brain of John Murrell, known as "the great western land pirate" and "the wickedest man in American history" who "conducted the most fearful schemes of rapine and murder from New Orleans up to Memphis, St. Louis and Cincinnati." At one time his gang numbered more than a thousand men, many of them prominent and presumably respectable citizens, who profited from his extensive operations in crime.

Not only were travelers robbed and murdered, but slaves were stolen, sold, stolen from their new owners, and then murdered to prevent their betraying the robbers. Counterfeiting was carried on as a side line and Murrell, who was a man of some education as well as considerable natural ability, used the disguise of a traveling preacher to issue the spurious currency. But his greatest scheme was for an insurrection of the slaves, or raising the blacks against the whites.

In the midst of the terror spread by the Mystic Clan there was one man who had enough courage to try to end the reign of Murrell. Virgil A. Stewart was his name and under the name of Hues he succeeded in joining the clan and, by playing upon Murrell's vanity, worked his way into his confidence. He became the leader's trusted messenger and thus was able to get full details of the plot for the slave insurrection. The uprising was to take place on Christmas day, 1835. Starting out presumably on a trip to carry the final instructions to the members of the gang scattered all over the South, Stewart took with him two trusted men and crept upon Murrell's hiding place in Arkansas across the river from Memphis early one morning. The first intimation the robber leader had of the downfall of his scheme was when he looked into the mouth of a pistol, behind which he saw the stern face of the trusted "Hues."

Although the arrest was easy, convicting Murrell was more difficult. Sheriffs, magistrates and other officers of the law, either members of the clan themselves or intimidated by Murrell's friends, refused to act. So Stewart marched Murrell to jail in Memphis himself and when members of the clan rallied to rescue their leader, Stewart faced the mob and told them that if a move was made to rescue Murrell he would shoot him dead. Murrell pleaded for his life and the mob dissolved. Finally Stewart succeeded in bringing the land pirate to trial, had him convicted and sentenced to ten years in a Tennessee prison. He came out a broken man to find his clan disorganized. Stewart was repeatedly threatened by the outlaws and several attempts were made on his life. Despite the fact that he had saved the South from the horrors of a slave insurrection, he was an outcast there and eventually he went to Pennsylvania where he ended his days.

He Repaid Our Pulaski Debt

SEVERAL million Americans during the years 1917-18 "repaid our debt to Lafayette" for the services of that gallant Frenchman during the Revolution. But a century ago one lone American took it upon himself to "repay Poland for the heroic Pulaski who died during the siege of Savannah in our Revolutionary War," as he phrased it. His name was Dr. Paul Fitzsimmons Eve of Augusta, Ga., who did post-graduate work in Paris.

In 1831 when the people of northern Poland revolted against Russian rule, Doctor Eve formed a committee in Paris to aid the Poles and went to London to raise funds for them. Then he went to Warsaw "to repay the Pulaski debt," and offered his professional services to the Polish patriots. Commissioned a major, he was with a party that was driven into Germany where he was interned and narrowly escaped death from cholera. Through the efforts of Lafayette he was finally released and returned to America.

Doctor Eve took part as a surgeon in the Mexican war and also served in the war of the French and Italians against Austria in 1859. Returning again to America he entered the Confederate army and held high medical rank under Gen. Joseph E. Johnston. At various times, until his death in Nashville, Tenn., in 1877 he held positions in medical colleges in Kentucky, Missouri and Tennessee.

Despite his many sacrifices in the cause of Polish freedom, he refused to take pay for his services but he did accept the Gold Cross of Merit in a Polish order. But aside from this his efforts in the cause of freedom went unrewarded for a hundred years. Then in 1931 a tablet commemorating his services was unveiled at the Military Medical school in Warsaw and a ward in a hospital there was named for him. But it was not until the Poles had taken the initiative in recalling this forgotten hero that his own countrymen set about honoring him with a plan to erect a memorial to him in his native city of Augusta, Ga.

Innovation May Not Be Always for the Best

"Everything that is modern is not necessarily better than the good old-fashioned things our grandmothers used to love," said Charles M. Schwab at Carnegie Tech. "I think we are too prone to discard old things for new, without first finding out if the innovations are really better.

"So far, we have managed to prevent these modernists from revising the Bible, but I am not so sure about some of these new textbooks that are creeping into the schools.

"A high-pressure salesman was trying to foist a new textbook on a village school committee:

"'It's the very latest in every respect,' he insisted. 'Here! Just look at page twenty-three. See that? The Old Oaken Bucket is now the Sterilized Faucet.'"

Recall Colonial Days

Entire rooms from Colonial mansions in the South and New England have been transported to St. Louis and installed in the City Art museum in Forest park to illustrate early American architecture. Acquisition and removal of the five early American rooms as completed at a cost of $50,000 and is one step in the museum's program for a rehabilitation of its building. Dominating the crest of Art hill in Forest park, the St. Louis Art museum was built for the world's fair of 1904 and is one of the three remaining structures of that exposition. The American interiors, authentic examples from Colonial mansions, come from Charleston, S. C.; Alexandria, Va.; Salem and Newburyport, Mass.

Wedding Custom Vetoed

Wedding eve celebrations have been prohibited at Camburg, in Thuringia, Germany, in their customary form. Usually friends of the couple gather outside the bride's house, and celebrate the occasion by the smashing of crockery, but this has caused such havoc to motor-car tires that the authorities have been compelled to intervene, since the town is liable for the damage.

BANK EMPLOYEES SENT TO SCHOOL

Modern Scientific Financial and Management Methods Taught Throughout Country.

THE American Institute of Banking Section of the American Bankers Association conducts 223 chapters, or local banking schools in as many cities throughout the country. One large city chapter has almost 6,000 students, who are combining formal theoretical and practical banking studies with their daily working experience and other places have these schools with a thousand to two thousand students. In addition there are fifty study groups in small communities with some 6,000 enrollments. All told over 42,000 bank people are taking these courses—not only clerks, but junior officers and even senior officers in some of the more advanced work.

The work of the institute has been declared to be "a dynamic economic force, pouring into banking a broadening, deepening stream of better qualified bankers than could be developed merely by the daily workings of banking itself," and it has been suggested that every bank worker should be compelled to combine institute courses with his work. A good many banks now make it a part of the contract of employment that an employee shall undertake to render himself proficient and trustworthy in banking by taking institute work and others make successful progress in this educational aspect of banking a pre-requisite to promotion. Plans are being developed to make the benefits of banking education through this organization more generally available in the rural districts.

Tribute to Munch

Tribute to the ability of Wm. F. Munch as an exponent and purveyor of the gospel of true conservation is paid to the veteran member of the State Game and Fish Department by E. M. Besch, Superintendent of Schools of Parkers Prairie, Minn.

Mr. Munch, former chief game warden, is now educational representative of the Department, and with a background of twenty-six years' experience, is visiting schools, clubs, civic, recreational and conservation organizations throughout the State to acquaint its citizens with the principles of conservation and development of natural resources.

In a letter to W. T. Cox, Commissioner of Conservation, Mr. Besch praises the veteran warden.

"We had the privilege of hearing Mr. Munch the other day", Mr. Besch writes. "He had a very attentive audience throughout and I am convinced that most of the pupils are going to do their best to apply the principles conservation he so ably advocates."

"It is my opinion as an educator that the hope of conservation really lies in the education of the coming generation. With this in mind, we are doing our best to teach conservation it the class room through the medium of various subjects. However hard we try, weeks of effort on our part are equaled in a few moments by one so well versed in his field as Mr. Munch."

"Much can be accomplished if every school in the State can be reached in the same way at frequent intervals."

Editors Note–We would like to have Mr. Munch come to Holt in the near future.

The Tax Rates

Average tax rates in Marshall county for 1931 will be 2.45 mills higher than in 1930, with the average rate for the county being established at 66.56 mills on which basis the new taxes will be paid, according to an annoucement made by Levi G. Johnson, county auditor.

The average rate a year ago was 64.11 mills which was also a slight increase over the previous year. The average rate for the county showed the slight increase due mainly to the increase in the state tax rate which went up approximately 2 mills this year.

Attempts have been made generally throughout the county to lower the tax burden, and as a 65 school districts will pay their taxes at a lower rate than they did a year ago. However, 38 districts showed increases, four districts having the same rate and 11 districts made to change their rates for the year.

The attempt to reduce taxes was more noticeable in the various townships and villages of the county with 35 townships and four villages having reduced rates and only twelve townships and six villages showing increases. There are two townships and one village having no change in rates for the year.

The average school district rate for the year will be 27.56 mills, while the townships, city and villages will have an average rate of 12.62 mills. The county rate is 18.5 mills and the state rate is 7.88 mills.

Residents in the village of Holt will pay taxes at the highest rate of any point in the county with their rate totaling 207.48 mills. This includes a school rate of 125.7 mills, municipal rate of 55.4 mills and the county and state rates which total 26.38 mills. The total rate a year ago for Holt was 195.05 mills

The rate in Stephen dropped from 130.55 mills to 114.08 mills. The Warren rate went up from 91.35 mills for a year ago to 91.48 mills for this year; Argyle's rate increased from 110.65 to 111.68 mills; Alvarado increased from 102.75 to 107.65 mills; Newfolden increased from 117.65 to 121.68 mills; Strandquist increased from 120.45 to 124.28 mills; Oslo increased from 118.65 to 126.88 mills; Middle River decreased from 183.35 to 182.18 mills; Grygla increased from 84.35 to 88.38 mills and Viking increased from 57.85 to 68.48 mills.

6th, 7th & 8th GRADES

Clarin Frederickson is recess officer this week.

Clavton Gunheim and Raymond Higgin did the best work on "To a Water Fowl", a poem which we memorized in the 8th grade.

The 6th graders in History have started the study of the Vikings which so far has proved very interesting.

In 7th grade Geography class we are making booklets in connection with the study of Australia.

Tuesday afternoon we were invited into Miss Lanman's room to hear a play given by the Fifth graders.

3rd, 4th & 5th GRADES

The third graders are ready for another new reader.

The fourth grade children are making booklets in which to keep their diaries.

Transportation booklets are being made to help the children see the rapid progress we have made in transportation.

May 2, 1930

Dear Lila:

I am now in Africa. I am glad we did not get lost on our way.

One day we were out hunting buffaloes. We soon saw a herd of buffaloes. We climbed a tree. We had planned on shooting from the tree. We looked down. There were about fifty buffaloes around the tree. We shot four times and killed one buffalo. We shot until all our shells were gone. We killed five buffaloes. The rest of the buffaloes went away. Then we went home.

Don't you wish you were here?

Your friend, Vernice.

The fifth grade are making traveling bags which are to be filled with different products that they see while traveling in the different states of the USA.

The fifth grade invited the other grades to a play they gave on Monday and Tuesday.

1st & 2nd GRADES

LeRoy, Morris and Lois had 100 in Spelling last Friday.

LeRoy and Rubin were tie all week in Arithmetic races.

In Nature Study we are now studying star groups. We have studied the Small and Big Dipper, the Draco, Milky Way, and Cassiopeia's Chair. We also have learned how to find the North Star.

The first grade have completed their study on the Eskimoes. They have colored some booklets to sum up their work.

In the second grade we are learning the poem, "Very Little Snowflakes," by Lucy Larcom. Last week we learned "Wynken, Blynken and Nod" by Eugene Field.

The New Year

To the home folks, this home bank extends its best wishes for 1932.

The year 1931 has been a tough one for many of you, but do not forget that the foundation of prosperity in this our home community is just as solid as ever.

We are passing through a most unusual condition, but with courage and faith, aided by thrift and saving our community, fundamentally sound as we know it to be, will come out of the experience stronger than ever. Of that, we hage faith to believe.

So, let us co-operate in 1932 to help bring this change to pass. It will mean more than happiness and satisfaction. It will re-establish business and bring general prosperity.

We pledge our help.

Short Short Story, but Neatly Pointed Moral

A certain king sent to another king, saying, "Send me a blue pig with a black tail, or else—" The other replied, "I have not got one, and if I had—" For these words they went to war. After many men had been killed they wished for peace. But before peace could be got they had to explain the words they had used. "What did you mean," asked the second king of the first, "by saying to me, 'Send me a blue pig with a black tail, or else—'?" "Why," said the other, "I meant a blue pig with a black tail, or else some other color. But what did you mean by saying, 'I have not got one, and if I had—'?" "That if I had one, I should have sent it." Both kings were pleased, and peace was made. Many quarrels are pretty nearly as foolish as the war about the blue pig with the black tail.—Montreal Family Herald.

The Bugle of Maracay

Emerging again into the sunlight I found the Irish captain still offering sturdy support to the adobe wall. "Every time our colonel wins a battle," said he, "he thinks he's Alexander."

"You speak in parables, Monahan; Pini falls a deal short of Alexander."

He grinned, and bent his red head to indicate a massive rock house a stone's throw to the north of us. "That's his headquarters—or will be until the Spaniards run us out again. He has lately entered it, with a lady . . . a reluctant lady, it's true, but the manner of Pini was gently but firmly coercive, so . . ."

"I shall apprise him of our danger at once; we must re-form, and we must keep in touch with the main body of Bolivar's army, else we are lost, for our ammunition—"

"Sure," he said. He caught hold of my arm as I turned away. "Is your pistol loaded, Garde?" There was a strange light in his blue eyes, and under his air of seeming indifference I read a definite tenseness.

"Do I require a pistol to approach our colonel?"

He shrugged. "Go ahead; you went in Caracas without a gun—and out again. This lion's den should be vastly simpler. A Providence watches over you."

The heavy wooden door with its exquisite carvings stood open and as I would have entered, a sentry put a gun across the doorway. "The colonel has issued orders that he is not to be disturbed; will the major wait?"

"The major won't; will you tell the colonel—?"

He showed white teeth in a wide grin. "I cannot; it would be as much as my life is worth to disturb him."

While I waited, wondering what should be done, the colonel's tenor, carrying the burden of a caress, came down the hallway: "Would not the wines of Montalban caress thy palate, Bonita?"

I failed to catch Bonita's reply, but it was not acquiescence, for the colonel spoke again: "When the Spaniards take a city, Senorita, they take all that is in it; may we, then, do less?"

He laughed at her rejoinder and continued: "Had I known Maracay held so gorgeous a beauty I should have taken it long ago; so fair a vision of loveliness may not be kept for a mere Spaniard . . . he cannot properly appreciate. Be not so cold," he pleaded; "a little wine, a little—"

"No, no," she cried, "ah, no!"

Name of G—d—the one voice in all the world! It had called to me in my dreams, it had ridden the wings of the wind, and now . . .

With no thought of consequences I thrust the sentry aside with a sweep of my arm, sped along the hallway and threw my body against the door, which crashed inward under the impact of my fall. By the time I had regained my feet Pini, pistol held ready, was standing across the table from me, and the Senorita Lamartina leaned against the wall, fear in her pale face and slim hands pressed against her bosom.

"Senor!" she gasped.

"Dulce!"

Colonel Pini, misunderstanding me, laughed. "Aye, dulce indeed, Major Garde, for she is the sweetest by far of all those that the stupid Spaniard has yet brought over. But why do you enter my quarters by such forceful means?"

Think! I must think, I must control myself; blind luck so far had been my portion, but now . . . Gracious G—d, give me the use of my brain! Pini did not recognize her, did not realize the value of the prize that he had won; then, manifestly, he should remain in ignorance.

"A vision, in truth!" said I, laughing. "But do you not know, my colonel, that the taking of Maracay has cost us over a hundred men? We would hasten."

She looked at me in amazement, resentment in the deep blue eyes, and I thought, an expression of pleading also.

"Aye," Pini agreed, "a hundred men indeed—but it's worth it; the Senorita alone is worth two hundred." I think the garrulous colonel had partaken too freely of the wines of Montalban.

"Yet there is much to do."

"Did not Bolivar say to take the city, and have I not done so?"

"Yes, but General Bolivar also said to hold it. Do you not know, my colonel, that half our Indian soldiers, having fired away their remaining ammunition in celebration of our victory, have discarded their guns, assuming them—empty—to be of no further use?"

He laughed. "A misfortune, but nothing tragic; it has ever been the habit of the stupid savages. A thing to be discounted as inevitable."

"And," I continued, "that the forces of Paez and Plaza have fallen back before the Spaniards, freeing the two wings that may now close in upon us; that if we do not move swiftly our lines of communication with Bolivar's army will be broken, so that, half accoutered and without ammunition, we will be lost?"

"How gloomy a tale do you bring me in this, the hour of my happiness." His acquisitive eyes took in the slim beauty of the Senorita, and I could have throttled him for the evil in his look. "Does your American cowardice come to the fore at such a time as this; do you not realize that, of the entire line of attack, only we have broken through?"

"Aye, and I realize also that the Spaniard will close in behind us. And this American cowardice of mine, Senor, does not presume to celebrate a half-victory with drunkenness and other unseemly conduct."

Pini brought the pistol to bear upon me. "Do you speak thus to me, your colonel, your commanding officer?"

"Under similar conditions, my colonel, I would speak so to Bolivar himself, had he fallen so low; a thing I cannot imagine, for, of all our officers, I think Colonel Pini is the only man who might have planned an act so vile."

Madness? Aye, a veritable madness; yet his eyes had offered insult to the Senorita, and I worshiped her.

"Ah, Loren," she cried, fear in her voice—and love, I think, as well. "How vast a blunder. Can you not see—?"

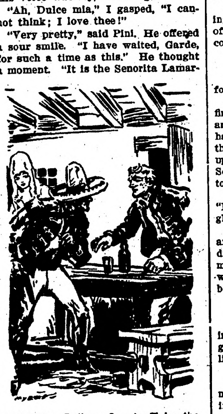
"Ah, Dulce mia," I gasped, "I cannot think; I love thee!"

"Very pretty," said Pini. He offered a sour smile. "I have waited, Garde, for such a time as this." He thought a moment. "It is the Senorita Lamartina—no? Then she shall see how we deal with insubordination, a grievous crime. At such a time I may be judge and jury and executioner, for it is my right."



"Did Not Bolivar Say to Take the City, and Have I Not Done So?"

"The pistol is not made, my colonel," I said, "that may kill me instantly, and if I am given so much as half a minute—"

"No," said Dulce, "no!" She came forward, arms outstretched, toward the man who waited, weapon pointing at my heart. "Anything, Colonel Pini, but—"

I thrust her aside. "No!" I cried, leaping toward him as the gun roared, filling the room with thunder. Flame traversed my arm and sent the red-hot pain coursing through my body. My right arm fell, useless, and the fingers of my left hand found his throat, and held.

No matter what befell I knew that only death awaited me, for this attack upon a superior officer, regardless of the circumstances or the provocation, could mean but one thing: a court and a decree of death. So, with the weight of my body, and the strength of my legs, I held him against the wall while my fingers did their work. I even laughed, a shrill maniacal outburst, and I talked: "Do you see, Dulce, my own, how a craven dies?"

"No, Loren, no; it is murder! If you love me, dear heart, you will not do it!"

"But he offered insult to thee . . . shall I not kill him for that, does he not deserve—?"

"Listen, Loren, do you not hear it?"

Now there came to us the clear high notes of a bugle, a penetrating, electric summons. I guess I am, and have always been, first a soldier, for that call to arms cleansed my mind of hatred and found a soldier's ready acquiescence in my heart.

Colonel Pini, freed at last, staggered to the table and braced his swaying body with his hands. "You will pay for this, Senor," he rasped through a tortured throat.

Wild yells followed the call of the bugle, and intermittent thudding of guns, then an orderly fusillade. I knew that the Spaniards, having re-formed behind us to cut us off, were investing the city.

"I expect to pay, colonel, and you will doubtless pay when Bolivar hears how you have thrown away the fruits of a dearly bought victory."

"After this skirmish," he said, moving unsteadily toward the wreckage of the doorway, "there will be a court."

"I shall be ready, my colonel."

* * * * * * *

"Ah, Loren, that you should have found me thus!"

"I am thankful that I was able to find you at all." I went to my knees and pressed my lips against a slim hand, for my love for her has been the sort of worship that mortals offer up to saints. "Am I not forgiven, Senorita, that I was so blind as not to see through your masquerade?"

She put her hand upon my head. "It is light again—your hair. I am glad, Loren."

The tumult of conflict approached, and I knew the force of Colonel Pini, drunk with a false victory and too much wine, and insufficiently outfitted with guns and ammunition, were beaten, and moving back.

"Do they lose—your men?"

I nodded.

"I am sorry; Spain does not belong in Venezuela. I have seen. You must go, you must save yourself. Your life—"

"Do you love me, Dulce mia?"

Now she came to her knees beside me. "Ah, Loren mio, there is nothing in my life but love for thee!"

"Then you forgive?"

"Aye, dear heart! Kiss me, kiss me and hold me, hold me close, then . . . Loren, you are wounded, there is blood. Ah, God preserve thee!"

"My arm only, but I can hold thee well with one." I laughed in an excess of happiness.

So I kissed the shining hair, the tear-dimmed eyes, and the tender lips, and I held her close to my heart again, for I knew that this would be the end. Defeat or victory for the forces of Bolivar, my fate was sealed.

"Polito," I said, "lies wounded, but not seriously, in an adobe house less than two hundred meters south from here."

Now she clung to me, face upraised in pleading. "Is there blame in thy heart, Loren, that Polito should be fighting for the Spanish?"

"A soldier may not turn his back upon his country, my sweet; Polito owes his service to his king."

"Bless thee, my own . . . Adios!"

Medieval Dishes That Called for Condiments

An important reason for the apparent vast thirst of the English of medieval times, William Edward Mead explains, in his volume, "The English Medieval Feast," is found in the dishes common to their tables, wherein condiments and spices played a major part. Loaded with pepper, cubebs, mace, saffron, cloves, ginger, cinnamon, nutmeg, galingale, cummin, licorice, aniseed, and other tart ingredients, they were prone to inspire the consumer to frequent draughts from the ale keg or beer mug.

Here again the element of necessity entered. For, the author points out, fashion had in reality little to do with the extensive use of these elements. Our ancestors, he reminds us, had not yet begun to breed beasts and poultry for the table, except that the value of the capon was remembered from former days. Mutton was apt to be stringy, beef tough; and men made use of food from sources that today would be avoided with a shudder.

In the hope, then, of securing an aid to digestion, as well as to disguise the exact nature of many dishes, the spice box came frequently to hand as the cook worked. For natural crudeness cried aloud for mitigation, even at the feasts where kings ate crowned and bishops dined in cope and miter.

Hope

The poets are full of appreciation of hope that makes an otherwise drab life endurable. Tennyson speaks of "the mighty hopes that make us men." Milton says, "What re-enforcement we may gain from hope." "Hope will make thee young," says Shelley.

Danish Flag Oldest

The Stars and Stripes is the second oldest established flag, the Danish flag being the only one which dates farther back in an unchanged form. The cross of the Danish flag was adopted as the national emblem in the year 1219. The changes in our flag are not figured, as the law establishing the flag provided for them. At the time the United States flag was officially adopted, on June 14, 1777, there were a good many national flags which had been in use for a considerable period of time, but through changes in government these flags have all since been changed in one way or another. The present British national flag, or "Union Jack," was not adopted until 1801, the date of the union of Great Britain with Ireland.

LIFE'S LITTLE JESTS

KINDLY ATTITUDE

One of the most important things you can do to make a teething baby comfortable is to see that little bowels do their work of carrying off waste matter promptly and regularly. For this nothing is better than Castoria, a pure vegetable preparation specially made for babies and children. Castoria acts so gently you can give it to young infants to relieve colic. Yet it is always effective, for older children, too. Remember, Castoria contains no harsh drugs, no narcotics—is absolutely harmless. When your baby is fretful with teething or a food upset, give a cleansing dose of Castoria. Be sure you get genuine Castoria with the name:

Cashew Not a Nut

Comparatively unknown a few years ago, the cashew nut now rivals the walnut and pecan in popularity and may be bought in almost any drug or grocery store. Last year this country consumed more than 5,000,000 pounds of cashews. The cashew "nut" is not really a nut, says T. Ralph Robinson, of the United States Department of Agriculture, but the seed of a fleshy fruit borne in clusters on a large evergreen tropical tree. Curiously, the seed is attached to the outside, at the lower end of the fruit. The cashew tree thrives in Porto Rico and other West Indian islands, and a few trees have fruited in Florida.

That Mutual Affection of Teacher and Pupil

"Schools are much different now from what they were when I was a lad," declared Senator Moses in a recent address. "Nowadays, with its bright sunny rooms, its variety of study and exercise, school has become a pleasure for the young people instead of a drudgery. But I expect that for the teachers, things are much the same.

"I expect that some of the young folks realize this, too, for just after the September term opened I asked a young friend of mine:

"'I see school has opened again. Were you glad to get back to your desk and see your teacher?'

"'Well,' said Johnny with a grin, 'I guess I was just about as glad to see teacher as she was to see me.'"

Forgotten HEROES

By

ELMO SCOTT WATSON

The Hero of Campbell's Island

NOT all of the heroes of the War of 1812 made their bid for fame on the battlefields of the East or in the naval fighting which forms such a brilliant page in the history of that conflict. Out in what was then "the West" there were heroes, too. One of them was Capt. Stephen Rector.

In 1814 Captains Rector and Riggs with 66 Illinois Rangers were ordered to accompany Lieutenant Campbell with a force of 42 regulars in three keel boats up the Mississippi to reinforce the garrison at Prairie du Chien in Wisconsin. Going through the dangerous rapids near Rock Island, Campbell's barge was driven ashore on the small island which now bears his name. Here he prepared to spend the night but no sooner had he pitched his camp than he was attacked by a war party of Sac Indians under Chief Black Hawk and driven back to their boat.

Rector and Riggs, hearing the firing, tried to return to his aid but in the storm-tossed river Riggs' boat became unmanageable and was stranded in the rapids. Rector managed to bring his boat near enough to Campbell's men, hiding in the trees which fringed the edge of the island, to fire upon the savages at long range. Suddenly Rector was horrified to see Campbell's barge burst into flames. Caught between the blazing boat and Black Hawk's whooping braves, the regulars faced annihilation.

Rector made his decision instantly. Ordering the anchor to be raised and the barge to be lightened by casting overboard nearly all of his provisions, he guided his boat down the raging stream into the teeth of the Indian fire. Forcing it to the windward of the burning boat, his boatmen leaped into the water and held their craft close to Campbell's barge. Indian bullets were crashing into the timbers of both boats but Rector coolly went about the work of directing the rescue of Campbell's men. While some of the Rangers opened fire on the Indians, the others transferred the wounded and dying from the burning barge to their own.

Finally the last wounded man had been transferred. Then Rector cast off and running a gantlet of renewed Indian fire, his boat swept down the river with its precious cargo of wounded men safely out of the range of the enemy guns.

He Saved Pennsylvania

ON A hot summer's night in 1763 the fate of the colony of Pennsylvania—and perhaps of all the English colonies—rested in the hands of the commander of a little body of English troops camped on a barren hill about 20 miles from the present site of Pittsburgh, Pa. He was Col. Henry Bouquet, a Swiss soldier of fortune who was leading a little army of less than 500 men, composed of detachments of the Sixtieth regiment of Royal Americans, the Seventy-seventh regiment, Montgomery's Highlanders, the Forty-second regiment of Royal Highlanders (the famous "Black Watch") and a few rangers, from Fort Ligonier to raise the siege of Fort Pitt.

Pontiac, the great Ottawa chieftain, had united the tribes to wipe out the hated English. Every military post in western Pennsylvania, except Pitt and Ligonier had been captured. If Pitt fell, Ligonier fell and a storm of savage wrath would break over the towns of Shippensburg, Carlisle and Bedford into which hundreds of terror-stricken fugitives had crowded.

About noon on August 5 Bouquet's advance guard was attacked. The "Black Watch" soon scattered them but almost immediately the savages came swarming back and within a short time the soldiers were surrounded and fighting for their lives behind a hastily constructed defense on top of Edge hill. All afternoon they beat off the attacks. That night their case seemed hopeless.

When morning came the Indians renewed their attacks. Bouquet saw that it was only a matter of time until the plunging fire of the enemy cut down his force until the few that were left could not withstand the charge that was sure to come. Deciding to wager everything on one stroke, he planned a daring maneuver. After explaining to his men exactly what they were to do, so that there would be no mistake and no panic when it got under way, he suddenly withdrew the two companies of Highlanders from the line, had them retreat across the hill and enter a small ravine. Seeing this, the Indians believed that a general retreat was about to begin and came whooping into the open.

This was just what Bouquet wanted. As the mass of savages struck the weakened line, the "Black Watch" came charging out of the ravine on the flank of the enemy. Too late the Indians realized they had been trapped. For Bouquet again broke his line, threw two companies of light infantry out of the circle on the other flank and the savages were caught between two fires. Within a few minutes the English were in full possession of the field. Bouquet then pushed on to Fort Pitt and a death blow had been struck to the conspiracy of Pontiac.

HOME PLANNING AIDS REVIEWED ON RADIO

Speaker Will Cover the President's Home Building Conference.

Bruce L. Melvin, research secretary of the committee on Farm and Village Housing, of the President's conference on home building and ownership, will tell National Farm and Home Hour listeners what aids to planning farm and city houses can be had from the committee, when he speaks in the United States Department of Agriculture period of the Farm and Home Hour.

The Farmers' Educational and Co-operative Union monthly broadcast will be heard in the National Farm Home Hour on Wednesday, January 20, and will feature a prominent speaker on agricultural subjects.

Another episode in the experiences of the United States Forest Rangers will be given on Thursday, January 21. This series, inaugurated this month, is designed to arouse greater interest in forest fire prevention and protection.

Many Government Speakers on Air

Five hundred and fifteen broadcasting hours were utilized by the United States government over the networks of the National Broadcasting company during 1931, M. H. Aylesworth, president of the company, reports.

The United States Department of Agriculture made the greatest use of radio during the year. Exactly 254 officials of this department gave 581 talks before the microphone. Most of these talks were broadcast in the National Farm and Home Hour, broadcast each week day at 11:30 a. m. to 12:30 p. m., central standard time.

President Hoover, Mr. Aylesworth's report shows, spoke 29 times, which is the greatest number of times any President has been heard over the radio in one year; Vice President Curtis made three radio speeches; the chief justice, Charles Evans Hughes, spoke five times.

Every member of the cabinet faced the microphone at least once during the year.

Thirty-two members of the senate made 52 radio addresses, and members of the house spoke 25 times.

America's three service bands were heard in 241 contests, many of which were in the National Farm and Home Hour. The Army band broadcast 103 times, the Marine band 71 times, and the Navy band 67 times.

Numerous officials of foreign governments also spoke over the networks.

Since his inauguration President Hoover has made 66 radio addresses. In his seven years as President, Calvin Coolidge spoke only 37 times over the radio. Many of President Hoover's addresses were made directly from the White House.

All known records for a continuous broadcast were broken recently when Gene and Glenn were on the air from WTAM in Cleveland for more than seven hours in the interest of the Cleveland Christmas fund program.

Daddy's Evening Fairy Tale

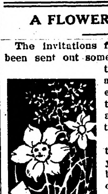
MARY GRAHAM BONNER

COPYRIGHT BY WESTERN NEWSPAPER UNION

A FLOWERY PARTY

The invitations for the party had been sent out some time before, for the fairies wanted all the other little elves and brownies to be sure to come, and and the invitations read like this:

"The Queen of the Fairies invites you to a dance to be given at sunset on the first day of the spring flower storm."



Dressed Up.

Now you know when most people give dances they say "the first day of November," or "the first day of June," but to the fairies it was most important that it should be the first day that there was to be a flower storm, whether it was the first or the last day of the month.

A flower storm is a different kind of a storm from any other. It is a storm of all the early spring flowers and blossoms which come flying down over the ground just at a certain day in the spring when the soft south wind blows gently and tell the blossoms to drop to the soft earth.

All the guests seemed to have understood what the invitations meant for they were all there, dressed up in their best ball clothes.

And then came the storm. Such a storm. The lovely, sweet-smelling blossoms of spring danced and flew about.

Then they landed on the soft, cool earth, and then they would go dancing off to another spot.

In the woods nearby the little violets waved about and laughed. Have you ever heard a violet laugh?

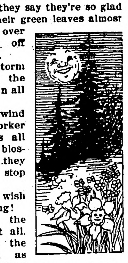
It's so soft a sound no one can actually hear it but the fairies. It is a little spring message the violets always whisper to the fairies, though the fairies say it sounds more like a laugh than anything else.

This is what the violets whisper:

"We're so glad to be awake and to be here for your storm dance."

And just as they say they're so glad to be awake their green leaves almost cover them over and they go off napping again.

But the storm continues and the dancing goes on all the time.



He Laughed.

The south wind is a hard worker and he blows all the spring blossoms about so they simply cannot stop dancing.

Nor do they wish to stop dancing!

And how the fairies love it all. But just as the storm began, as soon as Mr. Red Sun was starting off for bed, Mr. Moon came peeping up behind the tall pine trees and said:

"Such goings on I never saw before."

He laughed heartily and merrily, while the spring blossoms danced.

After a while they were all quite weary with the dancing and they all fell asleep.

Colds are common because people are careless. Prompt use of aspirin will always check a cold. Or relieve your cold at any stage. And genuine aspirin can't hurt you. Take two tablets of Bayer Aspirin at the first indication of a cold, and that's usually the end of it. If every symptom hasn't disappeared in a few hours, repeat. Bayer Aspirin does not depress the heart. Take enough to give complete relief. And if your throat is sore, dissolve three tablets in water and gargle away all soreness. In every package of genuine Bayer Aspirin are proven directions for colds, headaches, sore throat, neuralgia, neuritis. Millions who used to suffer from these things have found winter comfort in aspirin.

CHAIN, GROUP AND BRANCH BANKING

Bankers' Commission Describes Differences Among Various Kinds of Multi-Office Banks.

THE Economic Policy Commission of the American Bankers Association has made the following statement on various types of banking systems operating through more than one office:

"We find that there are recognized in the banking world three types of multiple banking organizations, namely, chain bank systems, group bank systems and branch bank systems. They are alike solely in respect to the fact that each embraces under some form of common control or influence two or more banking places, but here the similarity stops since there are essential differences in organization and administration, especially as between branch banking and the chain and group forms.

"Chain banking is recognized as probably the least definite form of multiple banking organization. Generally speaking, this term refers to merely a string of individual separately chartered banks owned or controlled through stock holdings by one or more common individuals, sometimes without public knowledge of the common ownership. Frequently the controlled banks are not administered as a coherent whole under the guidance of a central, publicly known head office, but rather each bank is run as a separate unit bank in accord with the wishes of the dominant interest. In some cases, however, there is a central, publicly known control with a head office that formally supervises the operations of all the banks controlled, and this is perhaps the more desirable arrangement. It lacks, however, the definite legal responsibility that a corporate head organization would have. Each bank in a chain system operates under its own capital and there is ordinarily no binding relation among members of the string.

Group Responsibility

"Group banking, on the other hand, is a system in which, while the member banks are separately chartered and operate as individual units with their own capital, control is exercised through a publicly known corporate organization under the direction of a responsible head office. It openly holds stock control of the member banks and is morally and legally responsible as the chief stockholder for their administration and the statutory share of their liabilities. An essential feature is the fact that an organization of this kind is publicly known, which creates a large degree of responsiveness to public opinion. This is true because anything of an undesirable nature developing in one member of the group would create public distrust of the whole group. Therefore its sense of self-preservation as a group, if nothing else, tends to make it enforce standards of conduct throughout the members of the group and to assume responsibilities for them beyond what more legal responsibilities would bring about.

"Branch banking is completely distinct from the two foregoing forms of multiple organization in that it does not consist of a string, chain or group of independent banks, for there is only one chartered bank in a branch organization and the extensions from it are all in the form of sub-offices without separate capital or corporate existence. For everything that is done through these offices the bank itself is just as responsible legally and in every other sense of the word as though it were done over its own counters in its head office."

Bankers Help

In a report on banker-farmer work, H. Lane Young, Chairman Agricultural Commission, American Bankers Association, shows that during the past year there were 409 meetings reported in 38 states, with a total attendance of 38,578. County key bankers numbering 2,541 were appointed in 39 states. Thirty-four states reported an expenditure by banks of $105,926 for developing better agricultural practices.

Special banker-farmer activities engaged in by banks in 27 states numbered 8,433, while 7,140 projects or farm programs were carried on by rural people through the influence of bankers.

For three years the Agricultural Commission has given special recognition to the state reporting the highest record of accomplishments and this year Georgia achieved first place with its banker-farmer agricultural program. Representatives of the Georgia State College and officials of the Georgia Bankers Association developed the methods and policies which made it possible for Georgia to carry out an effective program which emphasized "directed credit from banks for producing crops on the live-at-home basis."

Appreciation for the cooperation received from local bankers was recently expressed by County Agent R. E. Bodley of Gallatino County, Montana, who said: "My personal experience has been that the average banker will go more than half way with the county agent, providing the latter has demonstrated that his work is constructive and conservative, that he is a man capable of handling confidential information and treating it as such, and one who can 'keep his feet on the ground'."

Livestock Shippers to Meet

The members of the Holt Co-Operative Livestock Shipping association will hold their annual meeting here on Monday, Feb. 1st, to elect officers for the coming year and, check over the annual report of the manager.

According to a report furnished us by H. Moberg, manager for the local association, they did a big business the past year.

40 carloads of livestock were shipped from here to So. Saint Paul, carrying 3105 head of livestock. These shipments included 844 head of cattle, 263 head of hogs and 1998 head of sheep.

The gross sales of the livestock at South St. Paul amounted to $30,945.34 of which amount farmers here received $26,637.85 and the remaining $4,307.49 was spent for freight haul and other marketing expenses.

Central Co-Op. Assn. Pays 30% Refunds

Directors of the Central Co-Operative Association declared a 30 per cent patronage refund on commissions charged for selling livestock in 1931 in addition to the 8 per cent dividend declared on capital stock outstanding, the maximum that can be paid under the co-operative laws of the State of Minnesota. This was announced January 7th, following a board meeting at the executive office of the Central Co-Operative Association in St. Paul.

It will benefit the member patrons of this association exactly $120,265.79, which amount is the second largest refund to be made by the organization, and $12,484.72 more than paid in 1930.

Since its organization in 1921, the Central has never failed to pay a liberal patronage refund and stock dividend to farmers at the end of each year, and the 1931 returns will make a total of $1,030,593.00 to be refunded to Central patrons in the last ten years. This was done upon a commission basis 25 per cent below most of Central's competitors.

Farmers apparently have sensed the need for co-operative marketing during this period of depression more than ever, for in 1931 the Central experienced its second largest year in volume of livestock handled as well as net earning. When truck receipts are reduced to a car basis, a total of 22,635 cars of livestock were sold through this co-operative association during the year. This was 1,347 cars in excess of the 1930 total, and within 311 cars of equalling the year of 1926, the record year for receipts at So. St. Paul. Total receipts handled by the Central comprised 28.25 per cent of all livestock marketed at South St. Paul, and Central's percentage of rail car receipts alone 34.28 per cent, the largest rail percentage in the records of the organization.

This is the endorsement of an organization built upon honor that is truly cooperative and is outstandingly rendering efficient service.

"Livestock farmers throughout the northwest will soon be going to St. Paul to attend the annual stockholders meeting of the Central Co-Operative Association", said N. K. Carnes, General Manager. "This will be the eleventh annual meeting of stockholders in this association and will be held at the Lowry Hotel in St. Paul on February 9 and 10. Enthusiastic over the remarkable record of their association, many members are now planning to be in the capitol city for the convention where an education and entertaining program will be provided for the occasion."

R. J. Lund of Thief River was here on Monday and checked up the books at the creamery and got the figures for making out the annual report for the board of directors.

School Notes

HIGH SCHOOL

A large crowd attended the party given by the Navy Gobs on Friday, Jan. 22.

We are all anxious to see the marks on our report cards due this week.

This morning when we came to school we saw George Washington smiling at us from the front of the room. A new picture has been hung in the assembly.

What was the trouble in the Biology laboratory yesterday? We don't like the odor of pickled frogs.

6th, 7th & 8th GRADES

The following are on our honor roll for the six weeks that have just passed:

Sixth:
Opal Sanoden
Bernice Kolden
Lowell Sovde
Seventh:
Eleanor Peterson
Gertrude Nohre
Clara Engebretson
Eighth:
Gladys Nygaard
Gertrude Nygaard
Clayton Gunheim
Thelma Kolden

Lorraine Engebretson is recess officer this week.

The seventh grade class in Geography made very good booklets on Australia in connection with the study of that continent.

In eighth grade Arithmetic we have finished the study of the various forms of insurance and are now working on statistical graphs.

3rd, 4th & 5th GRADES

Our room tried the demerit system for grading the children in deportment. It has worked out very successfully. The following received 100 in deportment: Robert Sandberg, Clara Hoffmann, Lyla Kolden, Vernice Tollefsrud.

In 5th grade, Robert Sandberg received a perfect score in Self-Testing Drill Five.

In third grade, Sylvia Haukeness received a perfect score in Self-Testing Drill Five and Six.

1st & 2nd GRADES

All of the second grade children had 100 in Spelling Friday. We are all trying to get 100 again this week.

In Art class we are now making a frieze on the life of the Tree Dwellers. We have just finished studying the Tree Dwellers in History class and are beginning the study of the Early Cave Man.

In Language class the second grade composed a poem to which they gave the title, "Where Are You, Little Snowflakes?" The title was Lois' suggestion and it was voted best of those submitted. Each child submitted a line for it.

WHERE ARE YOU, LITTLE SNOWFLAKES?

Where are you, little snowflakes
With your little white coats?
You are so clean and spotless,
You float like little boats.

When are you coming back to us
So we may roll snow and play?
You are so pretty on the trees,
We wish you'd come back some day.

Luther League Annual Meeting

The Luther League of the Nazareth Lutheran church held their annual meeting on Sunday evening. Dennis Wegge was elected president and Stilaf Anderson was elected secretary-treasurer.

Ladies Club Met

The Ladies Club met at the home of Mrs. Geo. Fricker on Wednesday evening of last week and the following officers were elected for the ensuing year.

Mrs. Sam Lorentson, president; Mrs. Fred Peterson, vice-president, and Mrs. H. Larson, secretary-treasurer.

Mrs. L. Wegge spent the week end in Thief River visiting with relatives.

Creamery Will Celebrate Twenty-Fifth Anniversary

Local dairymen will see the results of the operation of the Holt Farmers Co-Operative Creamery for 1931, on Thursday, February 11th, when the annual meeting of the stockholders and patrons will be held at the Community Hall here, according to an announcement made this week by T. B. Folden, secretary of the organization.

This will be the 25th annual meeting of the local institution and plans are under way for a good program. All the patrons and their wives are asked to attend.

The local Community Band will furnish the music during the afternoon.

Financial reports covering the year's business will be read and distributed to the patrons and stockholders, and plans for the future will be discussed.

Officers for 1932 will also be elected. After the meeting lunch will be served free at the churches to all who attend the meeting.

Annual Creamery Meeting

Notice is hereby given that the Annual Meeting of the stockholders of the Farmers' Co-Operative Creamery Company of Holt, Minnesota, will be held in the Community Hall in the Village of Holt, on Thursday, February 11, 1932, for the purpose of electing three Directors and transacting any other business that may come before the meeting.

The three Directors whose terms expire are T. B. Folden, Louis Wegge, and Theo. Sorum.

On this day our 25th Anniversary will be celebrated. All patrons of the creamery, ladies included, are cordially invited to attend this meeting.

A free lunch will be served at all the churches at the close of the meeting.

The New Year

To the home folks, this home bank extends its best wishes for 1932.

The year 1931 has been a tough one for many of you, but do not forget that the foundation of prosperity in this our home community is just as solid as ever.

We are passing through a most unusual condition, but with courage and faith, aided by thrift and saving our community, fundamentally sound as we know it to be, will come out of the experience stronger than ever. Of that, we hage faith to believe.

So, let us co-operate in 1932 to help bring this change to pass. It will mean more than happiness and satisfaction. It will re-establish business and bring general prosperity.

We pledge our help.

Cobra Worshipers Hold Deadly Reptile Sacred

Every year the dreaded cobra is responsible for the death of many thousands of persons in India, but so sacred is the snake considered that it is difficult to get the Hindu to assist in killing one.

In many Hindu houses these deadly reptiles have regular homes, and are daily fed with milk, and solemnly worshiped morning and evening.

At a place known as Subramanyaim, cobras are to be found in practically every house, and on certain festival occasions special services are held in their honor in the temple, thousands gathering from long distances to participate.

Although at any moment some member of the households harboring the snakes might accidentally be bitten—which means certain death—no one dare destroy the cobra on account of its sanctity.

Even where the living snake is not worshiped images of the cobra, carved in stone, are common, and in the early morning one can frequently see men and women offering gifts before these "snake shrines."

CHAPTER IX

The Spirit of the Dead

Of the six hundred and fifty men who had gone so blithely to the investment of the town of Maracay, scarce four hundred remained; starvelings trapped in a strip of jungle that lies between the Valencia range and the sea; blocked on the north by the sea itself, on the south by an army patrolling the road that followed the crest of the range, and menaced in the rear by an ever approaching body of well-accoutered and well-fed Spanish troops. Adolfo de Fuentes himself led them, and it must have afforded him a deal of joy.

"If we had Bolivar—" Monahan ventured.

Doctor Lindsay laughed. "Does our Irish Venezuelan patriot, who comes from Killarney, and who, therefore, must believe in fairies, imagine that General Bolivar might free us from this impasse?"

"Sure," said the Irishman; "at a word from Simon Bolivar men will spring, full-armed, like spirits out of the earth. But we haven't the spirit of Bolivar with us now; instead, we have a spineless jellyfish who sits and broods over his blunders, knowing that we face starvation or capture by the Puerto Cabello garrison when the army behind us shall have pushed us westward to the mouth of this funnel of jungle that holds us helpless."

Ten days before this a vastly superior force had pushed us out of Maracay. Fighting every foot of the way we had been beaten back, ever back. Eastward and northward we had gone, contending desperately, hopelessly, yet never giving up; each night finding us farther into the Spanish area, weaker, less able to endure, with a morale that gave way with the slow passage of time.

Between Colonel Pini and myself an armed truce existed. Whether, by some miraculous turn of good fortune, we won free, or whether the malevolent jungle or the Spaniards claimed us, the result to me would be the same; for the friendship of a few trusted aides of Bolivar might never save me in a court, because I was guilty and could not offer a defense.

Yet no apprehension of what Pini might do to me could prevail against my happiness, because I had seen the Senorita again, had caught the tender cadences of her voice, had won forgiveness.

As the days went by the shoulders of our soldiers drooped, the light went out of their eyes, and the flesh went off their bodies, for food we had almost none; and the desperate heat of the overwhelming jungle sickened them, and the gloom and silence of this dread desolation entered their souls, yet that vital spark still burned within them.

We came, one day, to a great rent in the close-packed trees and the interlacing vines of our forest prison. It was such a path as some monster dragon of the deep, emerging from the sea, might have made in its passage through the jungle; yet we knew that no dragon of the deep existed, knew that no animal might have laid these mighty trees flat and pushed others out of its path.

I recalled the day of the storm, and the wreck of the Santa Lucrecia, and the dark bulk that had passed in the gloom as I fought for my life with the waves.

I remembered that the tremendous thrust of the wind had lifted the ocean into the maze of woods, and had deposited me in a tree. The Santa Lucrecia, then, had freed herself from the clutches of the reef and, riding the elevated waters of the tidal wave, had driven over the flat floor of the jungle—which lay only a few feet above the level of the sea—and had found at last a grave in the forest whence it had come. And the Santa Lucrecia, I remembered, had a cargo of arms and ammunition and food!

"Colonel Pini," said I, in the long silence that had held us, "may not this small army of ours—given food and arms and powder and ball—win through the lines of Spain? If I fill them with food, and put weapons and ammunition into their hands—?"

"Are you mad?" he cried.

"If I do these things, my colonel, may I ask that this court will be forgot, that my wounded arm and the broken door at Maracay—and the Senorita—?"

"Lindsay and Captain Monahan may witness," said Pini, and he smiled, "my promise to forget Maracay if you obtain the manna for these starving soldiers."

"I will tell you, then, my colonel, that this path marks the first and last land passage of the Santa Lucrecia, and if we only follow it we will come upon a store sufficient for an army."

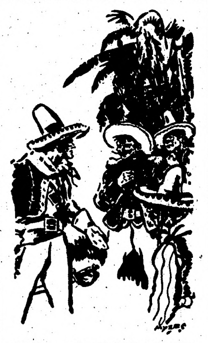
* * * * * * *

For three days we ate and rested and caroused, unmindful of the forces of Spain, for we could have held this ship against an army. And the lean Indians filled out like dogs at a feast, and eyes brightened, and shoulders squared, and patriotism flamed again, and strength came back to us—strength of body and mind and spirit—and the will to win was ours, and a desire to pit against the enemy this renewed vigor that belonged to us.

We put away one more gargantuan meal—a breakfast—and took, each, two pistols and a musket and sufficient ammunition to carry us through a score of skirmishes, and then we set the torch to the good ship Santa Lucrecia in a dozen different places. We turned our faces southward toward the barrier range, where an enemy awaited us, and with songs of victory on our lips, we drove onward up the timbered slopes while flames spurted skyward from the doomed ship and, spreading into the jungle, fashioned a raging hell behind us.

We emerged from the cover of the forest and fell upon the thin line that held the heights. They must have considered us shrieking demons from the fiery pit that we had left, for they broke, crying out in the fulness of their terrors, and cast their weapons away as useless against the imps who had just escaped from the blazing tumult that devoured the jungle.

On we went, ever southward, down the forested incline that led toward the vast basin of Lake Valencia. East of Valencia we swept across the fields that were checkered with green and brown. Free, at last, of enemy interference, we skirted the lake and bent our steps toward the town of Tinaquillo, near which, we knew, would lie the lines of Bolivar, and where, before the sun had set, we fell, exhausted but happy, into the arms of our own.



"Lindsay and Captain Monahan May Witness," Said Pini, Still Smiling.

Verily the spirit of the dead had armed the living!

* * * * * * *

Storm-clouds were gathering in the south and east, and thunder rumbled along the crest of the Carabobo hills while we stood at attention, waiting for General Bolivar to pin upon the jacket of Colonel Pini the coveted Order of Liberators. He complimented the colonel upon the courage of himself and his men in breaking through the Spanish lines and taking the town of Maracay, and he offered mild apology that Paez and Plaza had failed to help him hold it.

Francisco touched my elbow. "Do not your fingers ache, Garde, do not those capable hands of yours itch to take hold of Pini's throat?"

"Why should they," said I, for I knew that Monahan had talked; "did not Pini give me my life?"

"For the Order of Liberators," he said, smiling, "a cherished decoration . . . and to think that a man like Pini should have got it."

"As far as I am concerned, Francisco, our colonel may have it; surely it will give him little joy." Now I remember the look in Pini's eyes when they had rested on the Senorita, and a flame or rage scorched me. I wondered then if I would not yet have to deal with the colonel, and I hoped in my heart that I would.

"Has there been any news of the Senorita, or of Pollto?" Francisco's finger, I knew, was upon the pulse of Venezuela.

"None, except that Adolfo is now in command of the Valencia garrison, and we may assume that the Senorita and her brother are there also."

"With only a Spanish army of seven or eight thousand soldiers barring our way. A simple thing indeed," he jeered, "for La Torre and Morales, with all the available forces of Spain, await us on the plains of Carabobo."

"Then we meet them there, Francisco?"

"Aye." He thought a moment. "I think La Torre made a mistake when he did not dispute our passage at Buena Vista; he lost an advantage there. I—I cannot help believing, Garde, that at Carabobo tomorrow, we stand—or fall. The general stakes all on this last battle; we win an empire—or we are for ever slaves."

CHAPTER X

The Battle of Carabobo

I think Bolivar as a toastmaster was the peer of any man I have ever seen. It was his wont to bring his officers together once a week in what he termed a dinner, but which usually developed into a well-ordered carouse, for wine and rum and other spirituous liquors were cheap and plentiful in Venezuela. Bolivar, demanding only obedience of his men, took no note of their morals; wherein, I think, lay one of the secrets of his amazing hold upon his soldiers.

In the spacious hall of the adobe house that was his headquarters we were gathered on the night before the battle of Carabobo. Besides Bolivar there was the wise and suave Marino, chief of staff; Urdaneta, whom the general called Rafael, a faithful follower of Bolivar, who, for many years after the death of the Liberator, served his country with brilliance and distinction; Paez, chief of the llaneros, Plaza, Cedeno, Colonel Pini, all smiles because of his questionably won decoration; Colonel Mackintosh, Colonel Ferrier, who, on the morrow, was destined to find the fatal bullet; Captain Minchin, another Briton who fell upon the field of Carabobo; Moore and Lindsay, English medicos; Captain Scott, Monahan, the swarthy Manuel, Francisco and others—names to conjure with in Venezuela. Santini, the soldier, had not survived the storm that wrecked the Santa Lucrecia.

Under the surface of laughter and badinage lay the tension of overwrought nerves, for we felt the portent of the morrow's battle.

Men were called upon for speeches or toasts. Colonel Pini, whose bloodshot eyes showed the effect of the vast amount of wine that he had consumed, found unsteady feet and, swaying beyond the bounds of safe equilibrium, related the fragment of an amour, the questionable wit of which might have lifted laughter only out of wine-bemused minds. Manuel gave an account of my unsuccessful attempt in New Orleans to imitate San Isidro, and my equally unsuccessful effort to vanquish four men, which drew the attention of the gathered officers in my direction.

I had never made a speech, nor offered a toast, but when Bolivar, encouraging eyes upon me, said, "Should we not get the voice of the United States, a great nation after which we hope to pattern our own?" I came slowly to my feet, my mind a blank, and tremors shaking me. Leaning against the table for support, I stared vacantly at the half-filled wine glass in my right hand, and Pini, noting my embarrassment, laughed harshly.

"A speech," he cried gaily, "or if the Americano's mind refuses to function, a toast. . . . A toast to the Senorita—to the lovely Lamartina!"

A silence fell upon us—a grim foreboding silence—for many of these men knew of my mad worship of the Senorita. The look that I bent upon Pini had nothing of friendship in it; it was more like a challenge. That he was drunk I knew, and that her name upon his lips gained nothing for a lady was a thing of equal certainty to me.

Looking across the narrow table into the leering eyes of my tormentor, I felt the surge of an overwhelming fury, and before I had taken time to consider my act, or the consequences of it, I had cast the contents of my wine glass into his face. Then, while Pini spluttered in anger, I turned to Bolivar.

"That, my general, is the voice of the United States, where men are wont to look with reverence upon a woman. The amours of Colonel Pini—"

Pini came to his feet, his face flaming, eyes gleaming. "I will have his life for that, I'll run him through, I'll drive a sword—!"

I bowed, while Bolivar—the furrows in his high forehead deepening and his heavy eyebrows drawing together in a portentous frown—considered us.

"I think," said Francisco coldly, "that Colonel Pini forgets the wounded arm of Major Garde; it has not yet healed, and the major, therefore, would be at a serious disadvantage."

Sacred Manuscripts in Profusion in Chicago

Rare gospel manuscripts, dating back several centuries, have come to light in the Greek, Armenian and Syrian colonies of Chicago, the Chicago Association of Commerce announces. Recent discoveries of important manuscripts have revealed Chicago as a rich hunting ground comparable with age-old cities of Europe and the Near East.

The latest discovery, which has been purchased by the New Testament department of the University of Chicago, is a Thirteenth-century manuscript of the gospels in Greek, and is regarded by experts as being one of the finest known pieces of cursive, or running-hand script, writing in any collection.

The manuscript was brought into the United States in 1916 from Jamina, the Albanian city noted for its monastic library of the Greek Orthodox church. It was found in the possession of a Chicago dentist.

Garfield Monument

The Garfield monument occupies the highest spot in Lake View cemetery, Cleveland. It cost $225,000, was begun in 1885 and dedicated in 1890. The monument is 180 feet high, the tower 50 feet in diameter. There are five panels on the outside depicting scenes from Garfield's life. The stained glass is an allegorical presentation of the funeral of Garfield. A second casket contains the body of Mrs. Garfield, the President's wife, who died in 1918.

Second Educational Series of Radio Lectures Started

Authorities on economics, psychology and other subjects have inaugurated the second series of "Listen and Learn" Lectures under the auspices of the National Advisory Council on Radio in Education, over coast-to-coast networks.

Dr. Robert M. Hutchins, president of the University of Chicago, started the spring series in January when he and representatives of the Council outlined the lecture courses to follow. The programs are heard every Saturday over NBC-WEAF facilities.

The series is scheduled for twenty weeks, closing with a valedictory program the last week in May.

Among the Speakers.

International trade, the tariff and industrial planning are economic subjects to be touched upon by speakers such as James Harvey Rogers of Yale, Ernest M. Patterson of Pennsylvania, F. W. Taussig of Harvard, George Henry Soule, Jr., editor of The New Republic, and Walton H. Hamilton of Yale.

Changes and growth in personalities, animal behavior and phychology in education are topics to be taken up by Fred A. Moss of George Washington University, Henry W. Nissen of Yale, Frank N. Freeman of Chicago, and others.

Public response to the initial ten lectures broadcast in the fall indicated, according to the Council, that they reached listening groups in the home, school, special neighborhood gatherings and even fishermen of Nova Scotia.

PATRIOTIC SONGS

The songs that thrill Americans, patriotic selections written by inspired composers, will be played in the February National 4-H club program of the National Farm and Home Hour by the United States Marine Band.

The concert will be another program in the series by the Marine Band on "Learning to Know America's Music."

Beginning with "The Star Spangled Banner," the renditions will swing through "America," and the lively strains of "Dixie." These will be followed with "Yankee Doodle," "America the Beautiful," "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean," "Hail Columbia," and a more recent song written when the United States Army was moving to the European battle front, "Over There."

The programs are designed to acquaint and familiarize the 850,000 4-H club members of the United States with the music which is typical of America.

Each month an additional concert will be provided by the Marine Band. On March 5 America's hymns and religious songs will be featured. The programs are broadcast over a coast-to-coast network.

The series, which promises to be one of the most entertaining features of the National Farm and Home Hour during the winter months, will contain much basic forestry information of interest to both town and country listeners.

Forgotten HEROES

By

ELMO SCOTT WATSON

He Saved New Orleans

ASK the average American "Who saved New Orleans in the War of 1812?" and he will probably answer "Why, Andrew Jackson, of course." That answer is correct, but it would be equally correct to say "Capt. Samuel Chester Reid." And what is more surprising is the fact that Reid saved that historic city by fighting a battle on the sea several thousand miles away.

During the War of 1812 Reid was commander of an American privateer, the General Armstrong. On the night of September 26, 1814, his ship lay at anchor in the harbor of Horta in the Island of Fayal in the Azores. Despite the fact that Horta was a neutral port, a large British squadron, commanded by Commodore Lloyd, came to attack the little American ship.

It was a bright moonlight night when Lloyd sent his first attacking party of more than 100 men in four large launches into the harbor. The enemy opened fire as they approached and Reid immediately replied, driving off the launches with heavy loss. Another attack was made at midnight with 14 launches and 500 men who succeeded in boarding the General Armstrong but were driven out by the desperate resistance of the Americans, suffering a loss of 120 killed and 130 wounded. At daybreak another attack was made by the British brig, the Carnation, but she was beaten off.

Realizing that he could not resist another attack and finding his ship badly damaged, Reid scuttled his vessel and safely conveyed all of his men ashore. He had lost his ship but he won a victory that was more important than he realized. The British lost over 300 killed and wounded while the Americans lost but two killed and seven wounded. But the important fact was this: this squadron was part of the expedition then gathering at Jamaica for the purpose of seizing New Orleans and they had attacked the General Armstrong to capture her and use her as an auxiliary vessel.

But the British squadron was so crippled that it did not reach Jamaica until ten days later than the expedition had expected to leave there. The expedition waited for Commodore Lloyd and that delay was fatal to its expected results. For by the time it arrived in Louisiana, General Jackson had completed his defenses for that city and the world knows the result of the battle which he fought there on January 8, 1815.

Forgotten—By His Own Choice

SUNRISE on the morning of December 4, 1900, in the sleepy little town of Vigan in the Philippines. The town is held by 84 men of Company B of the Thirty-third United States volunteer infantry, operating against the insurgent General Tino. Also it is a supply depot where are stored 60,000 rations for the campaign and a hospital in which lie some 156 sick and disabled soldiers.

Tino has a force of 850 men. He will steal into the town under the cover of darkness. Then when reveille sounds and the American soldiers turn out, without arms, to answer roll call they will be met with a leaden hail from the insurrectos' rifles. But the plan doesn't quite work. Outpost No. 5 of Company B discovers the Filipinos stealing into the town and opens fire. Immediately the fight is on. Capt. Charles Van Way rushes forth and takes command. At one place he stations Private Joe Epps and Private Smith. His orders are, "Don't let them get across here. Hold them, d—n it. If they ever get in, they've got me cut off." And Private Epps and Smith "held them."

The insurrectos were repulsed, but snipers lingered, and from time to time poured in a galling fire upon the Americans. One group behind a churchyard wall was especially annoying to Private Epps. Finally he went to Captain Van Way and said, "I want to go and get those fellows behind that wall." "All right," replied the captain, "Take the men you need and get them out."

As it turned out, all the force Private Epps wanted was one man—Private W. O. Trafton, a big Texan. Creeping along cautiously, they located their quarry. Before the enemy knew what had happened, Epps was on top of the wall and shouting down at them in Spanish and English both to throw down their rifles and get their hands up in the air. To Private Trafton he shouted orders as though that individual was a whole company, and the Texan let loose a typical Texas whoop. The insurrectos dropped their guns and hoisted their hands. There were 17 riflemen and four others armed with bolos, all of whom Epps herded into camp as prisoners. Eight Americans and over 100 insurrectos were killed at the battle of Vigan. There were 40 prisoners taken—more than half of them by one man.

Epps was voted the Congressional Medal of Honor for his feat. But when he got back to this country he deliberately dropped out of sight. Finally 24 years later he was discovered in Muskogee, Okla., and there at a great gathering in a ball park the medal was pinned on his coat.

People of the World

The present population of the world is approximately 1,900,000,000. Estimates of world population before 1880 are not very trustworthy. Sir George Knibbs, however, considers that Michelot's estimate of 1,009,000,000 for 1845 is as well founded a guess as can be made. Accepting this estimate, it can be calculated that between 1845 and 1914 the average annual increase of the world population was .7 per cent. It was, in other words, increasing at a rate which would double the population in less than 100 years.

That "Pet" Not Wanted

Benny Girton, eleven, ran from the home of his grandparents in Nordmont, Pa., to pet a "nice shepherd dog" that he noticed near the house. The "dog" growled and Benny retreated at full speed with a large bear in pursuit. A dog on the farm intercepted the bear and chased it into the woods.

When your system is stagnant and you feel sluggish, headachy, half-alive—don't waste money on "tonics" or "regulators" or similar patent medicines. Stimulate the liver and bowels. Use a famous physician's prescription every drug store keeps. Just ask them for Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin.

This appetizing syrup is made from fresh laxative herbs, active senna, and pure pepsin. One dose will clear up almost any case of headache, biliousness, constipation. But if you want to keep in fine shape, feel fit the year 'round, take a spoonful of Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin every few days. You'll eat better, sleep better and feel better in every way. You will never need to take another laxative.

Give the children a little of this delicious syrup two or three times a week. A gentle, natural stimulant that makes them eat and keeps the bowels from clogging. And saves them from so many sick spells and colds.

Have a sound stomach, active liver and strong bowel muscles that expel every bit of waste and poison every day! Just keep a bottle of Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin on hand; take a stimulating spoonful every now and then. See if you don't feel new vigor in every way. Syrup pepsin isn't expensive.

Soil Not Needed as Bed for Crops

The plant physiology department of the University of California has found it possible to discard soil as a bed for raising crops. Water may be used instead and the results are far more uniform and reliable, with bumper crops the rule.

The necessary elements of plant food are dissolved in shallow tanks of water wherein the plants are suspended. Drought then becomes a matter of no moment, as a small well will supply water for ten acres of cheap concrete tanks.

The plants, with roots in the water, secure food in abundance without interference from weeds or weather, and they produce enormously. Cotton, rice, and wheat yield 25 per cent to 50 per cent increase over the normal for earth-grown, unfed plants. Tomatoes yield 40 per cent more than usual. Beets and carrots are ready for harvest 20 to 30 days sooner than is ordinary.

The whole process tends to increase production, shorten the time of harvest and turn out a superior quality of produce.—Ralph Aiken in the North American Review.

Bees Delayed Firemen

Bees proved more troublesome than flames to volunteer fire fighters of Silver Springs, D. C. Speeding to a fire the volunteers met a bee swarm. The bees stung, the truck stopped and the firemen fought. When they finally reached the fire they found it under control.

SOME DEPRESSIONS WORSE THAN THIS

By ROME C. STEPHENSON
President American Bankers Association

R. C. STEPHENSON

ONE of the most significant aspects of the present business period is that, while we had a speculative panic and while we have had a general economic breakdown yet we have not had any semblance of a financial panic, such as occurred in 1907, and in other years when the credit and monetary machinery broke down and we had money panics, suspension of specie payments and kindred disasters.

None of these elements of a true financial panic has been present in this depression of the 1930's. At no time was the banking structure as a whole shaken, despite the unprecedented rate of small bank failures that it had to absorb. At no time was the banking and credit machinery unable to extend support to the panic-stricken and broken stock markets and cooperation to all kinds of business and manufacturing. Anyone would have been a wise prophet who could have foretold that our banking and credit structure would stand up so well under conditions so bad.

Finance Taking Cuts

And banking and corporate finance in this period of depression are unflinchingly taking their portions of short rations and enforced self-denial that the nation's need for readjustment demands. Interest rates on money, yields on securities and dividends on corporate investment have all dropped to levels that constitute drastic reductions in the compensation of capital. These are but part of the necessary economic realignments that all phases of the country's working life must go through before a general revival of business activity can start.

It is my belief—indeed it is my hope—that the tempo of the next cycle of prosperity will be somewhat more moderate than the mad whirl of jazz that brought the last one to a close. I think it will be agreed that the worst aspect of the collapse of that period of false prosperity is the condition of insecurity for employment which it caused. Unemployment is our greatest public problem today.

Unemployment is the worst wage cut that the worker can suffer. It is the worst cause of stagnation that business has to strive against. The sooner we can get our masses of workers back into jobs on almost any terms the better it will be both for capital and labor.

TRUST BANKING SPREADING FAST

Government Official Shows That This Type of Financial Service Is Enlarging Its Field

SPECTACULAR growth of trust service in the banking field is reflected in the national banking system, Aubrey B. Carter, in charge of Trust department supervision in the office of Comptroller of the Currency, Washington, D. C., brings out in an article in the American Bankers Association Journal.

"At the close of the 1930 fiscal year there were 2,472 national banks with trust powers," he says. "Their banking resources aggregated $23,529,100,000, which represented 34 per cent of the number of banks and 80 per cent of the total banking resources of the 7,252 national banks. Trust departments had been established by 1,829 of these banks which were administering 79,900 individual trusts with trust assets aggregating $4,473,000,000, and in addition were administering 11,500 corporate trusts and acting as trustees for outstanding note and bond issues aggregating $11,803,700,000.

"These figures represent an increase during a four-year period of 446, or 22 per cent, in the number of national banks authorized to exercise trust powers; an increase of 725, or 66 per cent, in the number of banks actively administering trusts; an increase of 65,370, or 250 per cent, in the number of trusts being administered; an increase of $3,500,000,000, or 385 per cent, in the volume of individual trust assets under administration, and an increase of $9,340,000,000, or 379 per cent, in the volume of bond issues outstanding for which these institutions were acting as trustees."

These facts, he concludes are "a striking testimonial of the growing public recognition of the desirability of the corporate fiduciary in the settlement of estates and the administration of trusts."

"No corn—no credit" was a slogan adopted by bankers of Saluda, South Carolina, last year. "The proposition was kept before our people by a display advertisement in the county paper several weeks prior to corn planting time. As a result we have more corn raised in the county this year than ever previously, regardless of the need of rain in many sections," said one of the bankers in reviewing the results. Home gardens was another project advocated with like results.

School Notes

HIGH SCHOOL

The Honor Roll for this six weeks is:

Margaret Davis, Stilof Anderson, Julius Faiman, Frederick Voth, Clara Sandberg, Gladys Sanoden, Ruby Hall, Eunice Lindholm, Gertrude Voth.

Last week we had an election for a new editor-in-chief and class reporters for the second semester.

Editor-in-Chief--Beaulah Bennes
Freshman Reporter---Esther Doran
Sophomore Reporter --- Gladys Sanoden
Junior Reporter --- Eleanor Larson

FRESHMAN CLASS.

The Junior Business Class had a debate Monday. Resolved: That a business career offers as great an opportunity for service as the profession of medicine.

SOPHOMORE CLASS.

The Sophomores, I am sure, are all rejoicing over the fact that semester tests are over.

We are all starting the second semester with high hopes and ambitions.

Last Friday afternoon in Biology class Miss Anderson gave an interesting talk on a visit to the Feeble-Minded Institution at Faribault.

On the present honor roll the Sophomores have the highest percentage of sixty six out of a hundred, Freshmen have twenty two per cent, and Juniors have eleven per cent. Our present motto is: "Catch up, the Sophomores are beating you by far."

JUNIOR CLASS.

The Junior class has completed the study of the Civil War in their American History. They will begin reporting on the biographies of "The Builders of America" this week.

Last Friday the Juniors turned poets and all came forward for English III with a short poem which they read in class.

The pictures of Washington which lately took their place among the pictures of the school were given us by Congressman C. G. Selvig of the Washington Bi-Centennial Commission.

A poem was written by Eleanor Larson:

Composed of many a lad and lass.
First comes Helen, sober as a judge;
She's a companion whom I often nudge.
Ruth is the flapper of the Junior Class,
But even at that she managed to pass.
Next comes Oscar, full of the dickens,
The professor's given him a good many lickin's.
Billy Faiman's next, I'll bet -
He is surely teacher's pet.
Chester is seated last in the row,
He is over six feet from head to toe.
Then there is Ruby across the aisle -
She really does study once in a while.
Now I presume you've heard enough
Of all this kind of silly stuff.

6th, 7th & 8th GRADES

In eighth grade reading we are studying the Story of a Bandbox by Stevenson.

Gladys Nygaard had the best paper in History test Monday.

In sixth grade Geography we are finishing the study of India.

We are going to have our next Little Citizens League meeting February 12. We will also have our valentine box that day.

3rd, 4th & 5th GRADES

Third Grade.

Marion Olson received a perfect score in self-testing drill 7.

The third graders are studying Eskimos. They are making Eskimo booklets. They are making a health alphabet scrap book in their hygiene class.

Fourth Grade.

The fourth graders are working on transportation booklets.

Fifth Grade.

Fourth grade: Eleanor Haukeness, Lyla Kolden.

The Honor Roll

Third Grade	Ave.
Sylvia Haukeness	90.2
Fourth Grade
Eleanor Haukeness	90.1
Vernice Tollefsrud	88.5
Lyla Kolden	87.4
Fifth Grade
Opal Werner	90.2
Adeloyd Larson	90.1
Lorna Peterson	90.2

1st & 2nd GRADES

The second grade has received new work booklets in Arithmetic. So far the booklets have been enjoyed very much.

The following children had one hundred in Spelling last Friday: LeRoy, Lois, Betty, Louise, and Russel. Morris and Jerome had one hundred on Wednesday. They were absent on Friday.

We are going to build a store as an Arithmetic project. We are making the goods for store now.

We have finished our study of the stars and are beginning the study of the moon.

This week we are making valentines in art class.

The Honor Roll.

First grade: Ruth Halvorson, Ruby Halvorson, and Stanley Haukeness.

Second grade: LeRoy Fredrickson, Russel Sanoden, and Lois Hanson.

Your Creamery

FARMERS CO-OPERATIVE CREAMERY CO.
HOLT, MINNESOTA.

HOLT CREAMERY WILL CELEBRATE 25th ANNIVERSARY ON THURSDAY

Has Had a Long, Successful Career With Steadily Increasing Business

Next Thursday, February 11, 1932 the Farmers Co-operative Creamery Company here will celebrate its twenty-fifth year of business. The local creamery has for years been the leading creamery in the county and is now ranked as one of the best of the smaller creameries in the entire state. It has had a steady growth thruoghout its twenty-five years of activity, and at the present time is pushing forward as one of the best manufacturing plants in the great northwest. The creamery manufactured 304,807 pounds of butter in 1931.

Organized in 1907, the local creamery has since enjoyed the co-operative support of all those who helped in getting it started, and practically every dariy farmer in this entire territory. It has served as the backbone of our community when times were both good and bad. Besides having all its buildings and equipment in first class condition and all paid for, they have also accumulated a cash reserve of about ten thousand dollars. The increase in the amount of butter manufactured in 1931 over that manufactured in the year 1930 was 19,137 pounds, or over six and one-half per cent.

The fact that there are no independent cream stations in Holt indicates that the farmers of our community are unusually good co-operators. It might be argued, of course, that the reason for there being no stations is that the creamery is so strong, but there is more reason to believe that the creamery is strong because it has a very loyal host of patrons. A cream station was started here a few years ago but it failed to get any business and was discontinued. The shortness of its business career may be laid direct to Mr. Anderson who was our buttermaker here then, and the publisher of the local paper whom began at once to show the people why a cream station was no good to either the farmers or the town. No other attempt to cut in on the field have been made and so the local creamery has handled the entire butterfat crop in this community with added profit to its patrons.

Another important factor in the success of our creamery has been the fine spirit of harmony that has prevailed among the directors in the management of the business of the institution. That there has been little discord is indicated by the fact that there have been few changes in the management. For instance in the twenty-five years of operation there have been only five presidents, two secretaries and three buttermakers. With the exception of a two year period, when he served in the army during the world war, P. L. Anderson served as buttermaker and manager for nineteen years. Mr. Anderson resigned in the fall of 1928 to accept the position as field man for Land O' Lakes in the fourteenth district with his headquarters in Crookston.

The two secretaries are T. B. Folden, who holds the office at the present time, and John A. Sorum. Mr. Sorum was the first secretary of the company and served in that capacity for six years, when he was succeeded by Mr. Folden. Mr. Folden served a five year period and was succeeded by Mr. Sorum, who served another five year period, at the close of which Mr. Folden was re-elected and he has held the position the past nine years.

Louis Wegge, the president of the company, has served in that capacity the past twenty years. The first president of the company was P. A. Risberg, the second Carl Larson, the third John Simonson, and the fourth Ole Reierson. Mr. Wegge was then elected and is still serving as the chief executive. The present directors are Theodor Sorum, vice-president, John P. Augustine and Olaus Rodahl. With the exception of Mr. Augustine, who came here from the southern part of Minnesota only about seven years ago, all of the directors and officers are old-timers in this community. Besides serving as secretary for thirteen years Mr. Folden has been a director of the company six years, having taken an active part in the creamery work for nineteen years. Theo. Sorum has served on the board for sixteen years.

Besides P. A. Risberg, president, Andrew Bjerk, vice-president, and John A. Sorum, as the secretary, the first directors of the creamery were C. E. Smith, R. L. Olson, Frank Coppay, Carl Larson and Gunder Sorter, and of this group all are living except Risberg and Olson. The first buttermaker was Ole Hagen who is now living in Chicago where he is employed as a butter inspector. While P. L. Anderson served in the army his position as buttermaker was filled by W. A. Lindahl who is now the manager of the creamery over at Newfolden.

The present operator is Hans P. Wahlin, who succeeded Mr. Anderson in December in 1928. Mr. Wahlin came to Holt from Oklee where he operated the co-operative creamery a year. He secured his first experience in the creamery business at the Rindahl creamery which is managed by an older brother. Since then he was employed at the Buffalo Lakes creamery and also worked at the Minneapolis plant of the Land O' Lakes for a year. The assistant buttermaker at the Creamery is Tony Rhen of Leonard, Minn. He came here just recently and took the place of Leslie Shaver who acceted the position as manager of the co-aperative creamery at Leonard. Mr. Shaver was here for about two and a half years and during that time he took a six weeks course at the University Farm in St. Paul.

The following table showing the number of pounds of butter the creamery has manufactured each year, indicates the growth of dairying in our community.

Year	Pounds of Butter made
1908	87,915
1909	91,727
1910	77,070
1911	78,226
1912	76,181
1913	72,096
1914	67,611
1915	79,136
1916	85,959

1929	280,376
1930	285,670
1931	304,807
Total pounds	3,782,823

No exact figures are available for the year of 1907 but they have estimated according to the figures for 1908 that they made about thirty-five thousand pounds of butter the first year, of which they operated only six months.

The local creamery has made steady, consistent progress during the twenty-five years of its operation and it hasn't stopped growing. Dairying here is just getting nicely under way and the most encouraging progress in the history of dairying in this

"I haven't forgot it, and the general shall know. General Bolivar shall hear how he received that injury."

I stood aghast, for Pini, in the presence of witnesses, had given me his promise that nothing of that unfortunate affair of Maracay should reach the ears of the Liberator. Was he mad, could he hope to gain anything by thus breaking his word; would Bolivar forgive him for that vital hour of drunkenness that had cost us Maracay? I did not think so, for the Liberator was too good a soldier to overlook so flagrant a blunder. I waited.

"If there is anything," said Bolivar in a voice of cold menace, "which should have been told to me that either of you have refrained from telling—"

"Tell him," Pini cried, "tell your general about your arm; explain to him how you were wounded."

I imagined the wily colonel assumed that I would never mention the Senorita, which, indeed, I had no intention of doing.

"I am waiting," said Bolivar.

"Colonel Pini shot me, my general."

Francisco, seated next to me, rasped a bitter curse, and a sigh went around the table. The Liberator leaped to his feet. "Colonel Pini shot you? You jest, Senor."

"Not at all."

"Was this at Maracay?"

"Yes, my general."

"Pini would doubtless have good reason for doing such a thing." He turned a judicial eye upon the colonel. "May I expect an explanation?"

Pini smiled. "Major Garde, I'm sure, will make explanation."

"I attacked him, my general."

"Mother of G—d!" Bolivar gasped.

"That is," I dissembled, "my attack upon him and his shooting of me came so near the same instant that it would be impossible to tell which was cause and which effect."

"Was this—er—unfortunate affair in any way related to the loss of Maracay?"

"No, general," Colonel Pini lied; "it was purely personal. We could not have held Maracay with the force at my command."

Now Bolivar's eyes questioned me. It was not in me to explain to the Liberator how Colonel Pini had wasted a precious hour in drunkenness and in an unsuccessful attempt to win the favor of the Senorita Lamartina; an hour in which he might have made the necessary preparations for successful defense of Maracay.

"Colonel Pini is entirely right, general; that unfortunate affair was purely personal. I confess to having been insubordinate, I confess to having attacked the colonel, my superior officer, and I do not care to offer any defense."

Bolivar's face was a study. He must have known that, in service to him and to Venezuela, I had given my best; he knew that the Apure battalion of three hundred Indians whom I had commanded was the best of his native fighting force, for I had trained them with the greatest care. "Why, then, Garde," he questioned, "did not Colonel Pini make report of this on his return to Tinaquillo?"

"That, my general, is a question for Colonel Pini."

Pini must have realized that his burst of anger had opened up a dangerous abyss for himself, for he smiled and, assuming a pose of charity, said: "One must make allowance for a gallant soldier, General; our Americano has been a bit impetuous and I did not report that hapless circumstance because I had no wish to injure him in your eyes. Our personal differences will doubtless be settled as time offers us opportunity."

General Bolivar laughed, relieving thereby an awkward tension. "I cannot expect all my officers to love one another; it is not the way of soldiers, for most of them are 'sudden and quick in quarrel'; neither can I afford to lose one of them thus on the eve of our greatest struggle. You will have to postpone the pleasure of this contest between yourself and Colonel Pini until after we have won the battle of Carabobo."

"Aye, my general."

So we drank again, and Monahan, pinching my arm, whispered, "Any soldier who can dash a glass of wine into the face of his superior officer, and get away with it, must surely have the fairies working for him!"

* * * * * * *

Dawn came slowly as we rested on our arms in the early morning of the twenty-fourth of June, a day which might be termed the birthday of Venezuela. We occupied the timbered heights southwest of the field of Carabobo, and waited to ring down the curtain on the last act of the great Colombian tragedy.

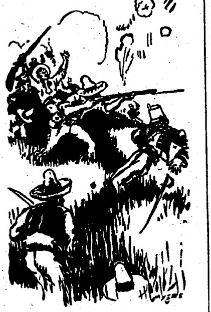
We had waited thus, six years before, I remembered, at Chalmette, waited in just such a silent gloom. Brilliant victory had been ours, and I offered up a fervent hope that I might find myself again in a victorious army. I knew that, upon the success or failure of republican arms, rested my success or failure in winning the Senorita Lamartina. If we won this impending battle, then Venezuela was open to me, and I could seek her out; if we lost, I knew that I would go down fighting among those Apure bravos of mine, for I had taught them to stand and fight until the last man could stand no longer. Of my little command, and of the British, I had no doubts, but we were only a thousand; the bulk of Bolivar's forces was composed of llaneros, sambos, and of other native troops. Some were good, and some, I knew from sad experience, were poor.

The sun glinted on the equipment of the Spaniards, who were spread out in battle array. They were possibly eight thousand strong, which gave them an advantage over us of two thousand men; yet they were hireling fighters, and our men were fighting for their homes, for their families, for the right to rule themselves.

General Paez, with fifteen hundred men, had been sent around to the right on a flanking movement, Generals Bolivar, Cedeno and Plaza, with a regiment of English rifles under Colonel Mackintosh, occupied the center, while my command and a battalion of llaneros were expected to hold the right wing of the Spanish army, which looked to me to be composed of over a thousand men—a task beyond us, I knew, for we had scarce six hundred soldiers.

The approach to the field was a narrow way, hardly wide enough to admit a file of men. The Spaniards opened the battle. The approach of the main body of our forces was in full view of the enemy, and we lost many men to their artillery fire before we reached the plain, where the various units spread, each to its task.

Under desultory fire of the right wing of La Torre's forces we advanced slowly and took our station upon a low ridge that commanded the plain; where, according to my orders, I placed my three hundred men in a position which seemed to me best to hold the ridge when a general advance of the Spanish army might be made. The Tiradores, and Vargas battalions, and a brigade of La Guardia had gone through the center to attack, with the British legion under Colonel Mackintosh following up.



They Fought Like Fiends.

The crash of contact filled the surrounding hills with thunder, for Paez and Cedeno struck—right and center—at once. My men lay, their slim brown bodies close against the ground, and waited. I heard murmured prayers and oaths, and saw nervous movements; so, while the air was full of the potent whine of bullets, I got to my feet and walked slowly back and forth in front of the men.

"Venezuela, my bravos," I said, "will be watching you today; when the men of Spain shall charge upon us—we will hold."

I saw Bolivar's unit reach the plain and close in behind the British legion, which had already made formation in the famous hollow square. As our center, under Cedeno, broke before the superior marksmanship and the greater numbers of the Spanish soldiers, as Paez faltered and failed, I talked to my men, urging, coaxing: "It is only the beginning, my bravos of Apure; we fight today for liberty. To run is defeat and slavery; to stand is victory and freedom. They will be coming now; do not shoot wildly. Wait, hold your fire until you can pick a silver button on a Spanish jacket—and do not miss. For every silver button you make your target a Spanish soldier will offer up his life."

With the aid of a glass I saw our right wing, with reinforcements from the rear, forming to offer battle to regain the ground they had lost. I saw fearful native soldiers of the center retreating through the ranks of the British legion, which, I knew, would stand as Britons have always stood. I recalled that half of the eight hundred men in the legion were veterans of Waterloo, and I was sure the center of the approaching Spanish line would be strong indeed if it broke through.

Again the enemy met Paez, while Cedeno reformed in the rear; and the main body of the Spanish forces fell upon the British legion, broke like waves against a reef, and came on again, while the right wing engaged us. It was beautiful to watch the grim silent Indians from the Apure river. They held their fire until the attackers were less than a hundred feet way.

I recognized Adolfo, and waved my sword, and called to him to come on; and my voice was drowned in a roar of musketry. Then the bravos leaped to their feet and, yelling wildly, charged with the bayonet. They fought like fiends—thrusting, driving, hacking, shrilling weird warcries, and moving ever forward until the enemy broke and fled before us.

We took an advanced position upon another lateral ridge, and prepared for the next attack. Behind us the field was covered with dead, but for every prostrate bravo there were two of the uniformed men of Spain. Scarce two hundred of our men survived, yet, resting on their arms, they laughed and jested among themselves, and told one another how many Spaniards they had killed.

Then in one concerted movement the Spaniards attacked all along the line, but Paez held, and the British legion, though called upon to withstand the shock of the bulk of Spain's soldiery, gave no ground; and the center of the enemy line rolled back even as the right wing struck us again.

The Apure bravos fired almost into the faces of the soldiers, after which they leaped to their feet to meet the Spaniards in hand-to-hand fighting. There was a frantic heroism about their ardor, a wild enthusiasm, a maniacal lust for killing that must have terrified the uniformed soldiers, who outnumbered us two or three to one, for they broke in dismay, leaving us again in possession of the tiny sector that we had been directed to hold at any cost.

And the cost, indeed, had been a grievous thing, for less than half of my bravos remained; I knew that the next charge of our enemies would find us too weak to hold. I looked back to where Colonel Pini, with more than six hundred mounted men, waited for us to fall, and hatred for the man filled my soul.

A body of soldiers disengaged itself from the British legion and, under command of a captain whose head was swathed in a crimson bandage, came toward us on a run.

"Monahan," I cried, "all honor to the British legion!"

He grinned. "That's the way we did the French at Waterloo, son. They charged and broke against our squares, and charged and broke again, and old Bony's heart broke with them. It's easy when you know how."

He considered Pini's force, a scant half-mile behind us, and swore softly. "What's the colonel waiting for, Garde?"

"For the 'break,' my friend, then he will gallop forward and win a glorious victory. These hundred men are sent to me?"

"Sure; if you hadn't held their right wing we could not have held the center. Those bravos of yours have stood like a rock, an unusual thing for native troops."

"And have died," I said sadly, "holding."

"So Colonel Mackintosh offers his compliments—and this hundred men—and he directs me to tell you that you have put the white man's dogged heroism into the red man's heart."

The veterans of the British legion had already been distributed among my bravos, so, renewed in strength and spirit, we waited for the next attack. It came too slowly to suit us, so we went out to meet it—went blithely, wildly, white man and brown—with eager cries upon our lips and the consciousness of imminent victory in our hearts.

After the first volley we met them standing up, arm to arm, eye to eye, and the clatter of conflict filled our little world with noise.

That mixed command of mine fought its way through the first Spanish line, then we drove ahead to meet the next one, paying no heed to anything behind us. On our right the British legion, having abandoned its defensive tactics, moved slowly against the center. Evidently it, too, had broken through the first line. From the east came wild cheering from the soldiers of Paez.

"We win, I think," said Monahan.

"We could not lose, my friend; yet they move back slowly, in good order. What we should have is a rout—an overwhelming victory."

"In that case," said the Irish soldier, "we need the mounted llaneros."

That must also have been Bolivar's thought, for a body of horsemen, moving swiftly through the center, passed the British legion and hurled itself upon the enemy, throwing the line into confusion. The six hundred mounted llaneros of Colonel Pini's command roared by us, and we waved our arms and cheered them on.

"There he goes," cried Monahan, with a short laugh, "on to victory!"

The right wing of the Spanish army crumpled under the charge of Pini's horsemen, crumpled and fled in wild confusion. The desperate battle of Carabobo, which removed for ever the rule of Spain from Venezuela, had become a rout.

The wings of Bolivar's army, racing across the plain, closed in to complete the work of destruction, for nothing less than complete destruction for the Spanish would appease the Liberator. He must have seen, at last, the golden opportunity for a free Venezuela, and he took no chance on losing. Few Spaniards escaped, few prisoners were taken; the rout had become a slaughter wherein the Indians' lust for blood was fully appeased.

Interesting Items —of— NORTH DAKOTA

McClusky.—Dr. L. J. Alger, McClusky physician for the last six years, will leave soon for Vienna, Austria, where he will study eye, ear, nose and throat work for one year. Dr. Alger recently disposed of his practice and equipment to Dr. W. G. Rogne.

Rolla.—The new immigraiton and customs office at the International boundary line on state highway No. 30, north of St. John, was opened for business. The group of buildings, including homes for two families, was completed this year at a cost in excess of $50,000.

Mayville.—Deny it if you wish, but nevertheless spring can't be so far away. Pussy willows are to be found in the Goose River Valley in the middle of January. A sprig of the fluffy grey buds was brought to the Tribune office, just to prove that North Dakota isn't as cold as Explorer Stefannson would have the world believe.

Cavalier.—A large group of Pembina county potato growers met in Cavalier and organized to fight that proposed increase in freight rates on potatoes, which, if allowed to go into effect, would almost prohibit raising potatoes for market in the northeastern country. The group voted 100 per cent to take steps to raise the necessary money to fight the case.

Williston.—The purchase of 5,000 bushels of flax to be sold to Williams county farmers for seed for cash has been announced by the county commissioners. The flax, which is to be choice Bison, was bought at $2.25 a bushel.

Bismarck.—Tentative sketches of several types of structures are to be discussed by the North Dakota capitol commission here. Members said they are concentrating attention on whether the building should be a tall or low-lying one. Members emphasized that no decision has been reached as to the final selection.

Bismarck.—Announcement was made by Berta E. Baker, state treasurer, that North Dakota counties will receive $125,000 as their quarterly share of the state gasoline tax. Under the law the counties receive one cent of the three cents a gallon tax for their county highway fund.

Ellendale.—Scholarship pins were presented by President R. M. Black of the Normal and Industrial college to 27 students who maintained an average grade of 90 per cent or better during the past term.

Hillsboro.—Edward F. Doran, former county officer, and his companion Thomas Fahey, both of Grand Forks, were arrested shortly after robbery of a bank at Reynolds, and charged with the crime. Both waived preliminary examination and were held to the district term of Traill county court which convenes in March.

Wahpeton.—The county chapter of the Red Cross has petitioned the Richland county commissioners to continue the services of Miss Mabel Draxton, county nurse. Miss Draxton is paid in part by the county and in part by Red Cross dues. Her work is among the school children of the county.

Grand Forks.—The Royal American Shows were selected as the midway attraction for North Dakota's A circuit fairs as the State Fair association ended its two-day conclave here. The carnival will open for showing of a week each in Minot, July 4; Fargo, July 11; and Grand Forks, July 18. Max Goodman, New York city, was awarded the exclusive contract for midway game concessions at the major fairs.

New England.—Hettinger county farmers made $9,000 more from their wool last year by co-operative marketing than they would have if the crop was marketed individually, reports of the Hettinger county improvement association show. Four cents a pound more was received by the members of the co-operative than those who sold independently. The total sale was $32,451.72. In addition, 133 farmers were aided in obtaining seed loans aggregating $28,717.

Bismarck.—North Dakota's vast deposits of lignite coal, once believed commercially useless, have taken their place among the state's major industries. Production has increased from 800,000 tons in 1920 to 2,000,000 tons in 1930, as the fuel came into more general use within the state. Exports to adjoining states have also proved an important factor in increasing the output.

Carrington.—Superintendent F. Ray Rogers of Carrington high school, has been appointed North Dakota's state representative of the National Association of Journalism Advisors, according to an announcement made by Myra L. McCoy of Cleveland, Ohio, president of the association. Mr. Rogers is director of the Carrington high school paper.

Carrington.—An animal resembling a lynx, or bobcat, measuring 35 inches, was caught near Bremen a few days ago. The animal was captured by Francis Porter, trapper, who found it in one of his weasel traps.

Fargo.—Giving an original oration on "The Supreme Court," Clifford Swanson of Fargo freshman in the school of science and literature, won first honors in the 37th annual declamation contest at the North Dakota Agricultural college.

I SAVE 50¢ A WEEK

I'm getting about 35 cigarettes from each pack of TARGET

I SWITCHED from ready-made cigarettes to the new Target Tobacco, and I've been saving over fifty cents a week ever since.

"But that isn't all. The cigarettes I roll from Target look and taste like ready-mades. I even find them consistently fresher.

"Target is real cigarette tobacco. It's a blend of Virginia, Burley and Turkish, just like the ready-mades use. That's what you get when you put out a dime for Target—30 to 40 of the best cigarettes you ever tasted. And who doesn't appreciate a real saving these days?

AND GET THIS

The U. S. Government Tax on 20 cigarettes amounts to 6 cents. On 20 cigarettes you roll from Target tobacco the tax is just about one cent. And where there is a state tax on cigarettes, you save that much more. Besides, we offer you a MONEY-BACK GUARANTEE of complete satisfaction. Try a package. If you don't say they're the best cigarettes you ever rolled, return the half empty package, and your store man will return your dime.

The Last Laugh

As Eddie Cantor, the comedian, was standing in front of a theater where all seats had been sold, a little man and his wife were turned away, greatly disappointed. "Here," said Eddie, "I'll let you have a couple of my seats," and he gave the little man two tickets. Delighted, the man gave Eddie his card, saying, "Some day I hope I may be able to do something for you." The comedian looked at the card. The little man was an undertaker. — Capper's Weekly.

Mercolized Wax Keeps Skin Young
Get an ounce and use as directed. Fine particles of aged skin peel off until all defects such as pimples, liver spots, tan and freckles disappear. Skin is then soft and velvety. Your face looks years younger. Mercolized Wax brings out the hidden beauty of your skin. To remove wrinkles use one ounce Powdered Saxolite dissolved in one-half pint witch hazel. At drug stores.

Tractor Statistics

In number of tractors per 100,000 acres of crop land, California leads all states with 523. New York is second, with 492. Illinois has the most tractors on farms. Kansas comes second, and California is seventh on the list. In value of all farm machinery equipment, Iowa is at the head of the list, Texas is second and California is tenth. These figures are drawn from the government census report of 1930.

Dawes Named Head of Reconstruction Finance Corporation—Laval's Blow to Reparations Conference —"Alfalfa Bill" in Washington.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

INTO the lap of Gen. Charles Gates Dawes, or rather onto his shoulders, has fallen another big job, and the country seems to feel confident that this Strong Man of business, finance and diplomacy will be able to handle it competently. He has been appointed by President Hoover as president of the Reconstruction Finance corporation which is to go to the rescue of banks, railroads and other interests whose assets and operations have been "frozen" by the depression. Two billion dollars supplied by the government will be at the disposal of the corporation and it is fondly hoped and expected that this great piece of machinery will, under the direction of General Dawes, extricate the country from the economic morass.

Gen. Dawes

President Hoover in announcing the selection of Dawes added that Eugene Meyer, governor of the federal reserve board, would be chairman of the board of the new corporation.

In a second statement the President announced that Secretary of State Stimson would replace Dawes as chairman of the American delegation to the disarmament conference in Geneva but would not attend the opening sessions, at which Ambassador Hugh Gibson would be acting chairman. Other members of the delegation sailed for Europe Wednesday, and the delay in the departure of Mr. Stimson was construed in Washington as meaning that Mr. Hoover does not expect a great deal from the conference. Of course Mr. Dawes' resignation as ambassador to Great Britain was promptly offered and accepted.

SENATOR SWANSON and Dr. Mary Emma Woolley sailed on the liner President Harding and will be joined in Geneva by Ambassadors Gibson and Wilson, who are already in Europe, and by Norman H. Davis, who preceded them on another ship. Our delegates have been instructed not to agree to further reduction of American land forces. As for naval armaments, American officials see little chance that any other powers will be willing to make armament cuts which would materially affect this nation's naval forces.

The French government, through Premier Laval, has plainly indicated that its stand at the conference in Geneva will be unchanged. It will insist on what France considers guarantees of security before consenting to disarmament.

At the same time Laval, submitting the foreign policy of his new government to the chamber of deputies, virtually doomed the reparations conference at Lausanne. He declared, in effect, that France would not give up her right to reparations, adding that all France could offer was to try to adapt existing international accords to the present crisis. Great Britain thereupon announced the conference opening had been postponed from January 25 and that further conversations were in progress. It appeared evident the parley, if held at all, would be only a meeting of experts.

CONGRESSMEN and other inhabitants of the National Capital heard a lot about the liquor issue during the week—rather more than usual. Senator Royal S. Copeland of New York, who is a Democrat and a physician, introduced in the senate a bill which would amend the prohibition act to enable patients who need liquor for medicinal purposes to obtain it in any necessary quantities on physicians' prescriptions. It also would enable physicians to prescribe such liquor without recording in governmental offices the disease from which their patients are suffering.

Sen. Copeland

"The Eighteenth amendment does not limit the medicinal use of liquor," Senator Copeland said. "The national prohibition act and related acts recognize its use as proper, but they lay down certain conditions with which a physician must comply when he prescribes and they prohibit absolutely the prescribing of liquor in excess of certain arbitrarily fixed quantities, for individual patients, except such as are inmates of hospitals for inebriates.

"The conditions long have offended the professional instincts of the great mass of the medical profession. The Wickersham commission unanimously recommended that these grounds for complaint be removed."

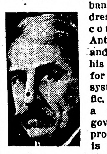
The senate manufactures subcommittee continued intermittently its hearings on the Bingham 4 per cent beer bill. One of the interesting witnesses was David Burnet, commissioner of internal revenue. He declined to predict whether legalization of beer would increase consumption over prepropibition days, but said beer taxes would create a "substantial increase" in revenues.

Representative Dyer of Missouri testified that states refused to enforce the dry law because the people regarded the definition of intoxicants as unscientific and dishonest. As a result Dyer said, federal judges have become real police judges.

NEWTON D. BAKER having refused to seek the Democratic Presidential nomination, besides having made himself almost out of the question by reiterating his advocacy of American membership in the League of Nations, the party leaders of Ohio agreed to support Gov. George White as Ohio's favorite son. The state's delegates, however, will be "free from any sort of control," which means they can switch to any other candidate.

South Dakota Democrats have declared for Franklin D. Roosevelt, and in Minnesota a movement has been started to secure that state's delegation for Al Smith.

"ALFALFA BILL" Murray, governor of Oklahoma, who was in Washington in behalf of a bill to remove the 10 per cent tax on state bank note issues, addressed the biennial convention of the Anti-Saloon league and rather staggered his hearers by arguing for a "zone control" system for liquor traffic. Though known as a prohibitionist, the governor said that prohibition "possibly is not the final solution of the problem of control of the liquor traffic."



Gov. Murray

Dr. A. J. Barton, chairman of the league's executive committee, replied to Murray indirectly by asserting that "the South will not be misled by the hue and cry about state's rights," and will not support any candidate for the Presidency who is either personally wet or runs on a wet platform. The league went on record as opposing anything that might weaken prohibition—referenda, resubmission, state control, modification and beer proposals, as well as repeal attempts.

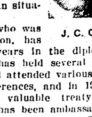
TWO or three weeks may elapse before Secretary of the Treasury Mellon knows whether the house judiciary committee favors his impeachment as demanded by Representative Wright Patman of Texas. The hearings were adjourned Tuesday until the official transcript of the testimony is completed and printed. Just before this Alexander Gregg, counsel for Mr. Mellon, read to the committee a cabled denial from President Olaya of Columbia that he and Mellon had ever discussed the Barco oil concession.

"This is the most damaging evidence yet introduced," declared Representative La Guardia. "Mr. Patman has been working for days here to show us that the oil concession was discussed by Mr. Stimson and President Olaya. Why did you get this cabled denial and why was it sent? Why should President Olaya show so much solicitude for Mr. Mellon and the State department?"

Mr. Gregg replied that he was certain no one in the State department as asked for the denial.

Mr. Patman read to the committee a list of stocks he declared Secretary Mellon had put up as collateral with a Pittsburgh bank for a $60,000,000 bond issue made by the Gulf Oil corporation.

ONE of the State department's best "career men," Joseph C. Grew, ambassador to Turkey, has been selected by the President to succeed W. Cameron Forbes as ambassador to Japan, and the choice is said to please the mikado's government. Mr. Cameron is anxious to quit Tokyo but may be persuaded to remain there for a time because of the complications of the Manchurian situation.



J. C. Grew

Mr. Grew, who was born in Boston, has spent many years in the diplomatic service. He has held several important posts and attended various international conferences, and in 1923 he negotiated a valuable treaty with Turkey. He has been ambassador at Angora since 1927. Jefferson Caffery, minister to Colombia, may succeed him there.

For the London ambassadorship vacated by General Dawes, Lawrence C. Phipps, former senator from Colorado, is being urged by his friends.

As was predicted, James R. Beverly of Texas was appointed governor of Porto Rico to succeed Theodore Roosevelt, promoted to the governor generalship of the Philippines. Mr. Beverly is now attorney general of the island.

LIKE THE THOUGHT OF BEING MARTYRS

Some Deliberately Seem to Cultivate the Habit.

Successes are all right, but it's your failures that make life really worth while—if you are really interested in the art of Martyrdom. All that's necessary to make you a top-flight martyr is to convince yourself (a) that you have been wronged, and (b) that you have great Spiritual Qualities.

Take business, for instance. You are anxious to put that transaction across, and you go to Smithers and give him your sales talk. He retaliates by giving you a super sales talk in which he explains clearly why your schemes are all wet. If you are foolish you put that down as a tough break, and sulk about it. If you are wise you become a Martyr on the Altar of Big Business, and have loads of fun. You convince yourself that you are a Noble Soul—not interested in material things, a Soul too good for the crass mercenary world in which you have been placed. People don't appreciate your Spiritual Side. Cultivate the habit of not being appreciated, and in no time you'll be so happy you could sing.

Or take sport. You go into a tournament, and take a beating from some duffer who obviously has no more Spiritual Qualities than a side order of spinach. Is your failure due to inability? Nonsense. It's due to your Spiritual Qualities. Think of the people you've been practicing with. Haven't you sacrificed yourself? Haven't you been playing against inferior opposition just to give the others joy? Of course you have, if you're worth 2 cents as a martyr. Couldn't you beat anybody in the world if you concentrated purely on winning instead of playing for the Joy of the Game? And there you are. You're a Noble Soul, and glad you lost.

Did you take a beating at bridge? Didn't you sacrifice yourself and make a fourth when you'd have preferred to be alone communing with your soul? (And maybe you had bad cards, too.) Disappointed in love? Obviously not appreciated for your Finer Side. Not invited to that party when you should have been? Because you refuse to stoop to being a pusher. Of course not everybody in the world can be a martyr, but, be honest with yourself. Aren't you one?—Kansas City Times.

Warm Compliment

Betty was a plump young matron who realized that her fondness for gay colors must be restrained in her choice of street clothes, in order not to emphasize her bulk. Therefore she hailed the fashion of bright-colored "hostess pajamas" with enthusiasm, and invested in a bright red set. She waited with patience for her husband to come home that evening and comment on her looks. He walked in, took a look at her splendor, and remarked, with more candor than kindness, "Heavens, Betty, you look like a blazing barn!"

His Kind Deed

A lad who has been taught to do a kind deed each day was having a heart-to-heart talk with his mother at bedtime.

"Did you do a kind deed today?" mother asked.

"Yes. Mary's curls were on my desk when she leaned back in her seat at school. The teacher was looking and I didn't pull her hair," replied the lad.

Cold Insurance
He carries it with him, ready for just such times. That little box of Bayer Aspirin. If he catches cold, what of it? Bayer Aspirin will stop it. If his throat feels sore, he will end the soreness with one good gargle made from these tablets.
Dangerous complications can follow the neglect of "a common cold!" Every case of tonsilitis began with "just a sore throat!" It's a wise plan to take aspirin after any undue exposure to bad weather, or whenever there is any chance that you've caught cold. If it's genuine aspirin it can't possibly hurt you; and how it does banish the aches and pains caused by colds, neuralgia, neuritis, lumbago, and even rheumatism.
Bayer Aspirin will insure your comfort through the worst cold season. The more susceptible you are to colds, the more you need it. Does not depress the heart.

Hindus Eager to Draw Chariot of Juggernaut

The carriage of the great god Juggernaut now rumbles through the streets of Puri, India, a trifle faster than usual. This is due to the large number of policemen on hand, who hurry up the festival as one of the many precautions taken to prevent suicides. Juggernaut's chariot has thirty-two wheels, wide of rim, seven feet in diameter, and it is under these that impulsive devotees as part of the centuries-old ceremony have cast themselves. The Puri festival is one of the most celebrated in the Hindu calendar and annually attracts thousands of pilgrims. Great ceremony attends preparations for the journey of Juggernaut, lord of the universe, and his brother and sister, to the Garden temple, where the three gods pass a week. Hindus believe that when God comes to the earth he incarnates himself in one of the ten forms and that on the day of the festival God incarnates himself as a "Vaman" or dwarf and appears in Juggernaut's car. Those who are fortunate enough to see him, they contend, attain salvation. The orthodox Hindus believe, too, there is much virtue in aiding to drag the car about a mile, from one end of the town to the other, which accounts largely for the eager rush to Puri each year.

It is the old intellectuals who have found out that what the young intellectuals are raising a fuss about is worn out.

CORRECT GROWTH for Children

You can help your children gain sturdy bones and strong teeth by giving them Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil daily. (It's the Vitamin D content that does it.) Known as Sea Unicorn

The narwhal, an Arctic whale, is known also as the "sea unicorn." Like the dolphin, it travels in schools, but it is seldom seen south of the polar seas. Little is known of it, but in the logs of old-time mariners there was frequent report of the piercing of a vessel's hull by a narwhal's ivory tusks. Because the center of the tusk, or horn, is hollow, ivory of the narwhal has never achieved commercial importance.

K. O. Flakne has received an announcement of the engagement of his son Julius of Minneapolis to Miss Anna Barbara Rapacz, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Rapacz of that city.

H. O. Hanson and C. L. Sandberg attended a meeting at Thief River Falls on Wednesday evening at which Senator R. C. Bell of Detroit Lakes and Thomas Frankson, Secretary of the Rural Credit Bureau, outlined our present tax situation and what we should do to remedy it.

Hoffmann-Elsner

A letter from Germany announce the marriage of August Bernard Hoffmann, son of Mr. and Mrs. Constantine Hoffmann here to Miss Elizabeth Hedvig Elsner in Eilau Muhle bei Neisse Ober-Schlesien, Germany on December 27, 1931.

The newlyweds will arrive here on February 16th, and will make their home with Mr. Hoffmann's parents. They will take over the management of the C. Hoffmann farm southeast from Holt as soon as they get settled.

G. Sanoden and family were entertained at the Hj. Peterson home on Sunday evening.

The weather has been cold. It has taken a lot of wood. The band is going strong. You will hear them next week. Einar Loven is supervising the changes in the departments at the Carlson Mercantile company. Little news this week. Everybody stayed home and watched the furnace. No war yet, but soon. The creamery is twenty-five years old next week. Send in a good news item for next week. See u when the sun shines again.

IN MEMORIAM

In loving memory of our dear wife, daughter, and sister, Mrs. Elner J. Pearson, who passed away one sad year ago, Feb. 4, 1931.

Call not back the dear departed,
Anchored safe where storms are o'er,
On the border land we left her,
Soon to meet and part no more.
When we leave this world of changes,
When we leave this world of care,
We shall find our missing loved one
In our Father's mansion fair.

CREAMERY WILL CELEBRATE

community has been made in the last few years. The farmers here are breeding up their dairy herds and improving the quality of their cows every year, and better and more profitable feeding methods are being adopted.

We are satisfied that dairying will continue to grow here and that with that growth will come increased development and better times for the entire community. There is no section of this state any better adapted for dairying then this part where we live. We now have closer market for every product the farmers raise and by sticking to the co-operative way of marketing them we are some day going to come out on the top row.

Mr. A. G. McGuire, General Manager of the Land O' Lakes plant at Minneapolis will speak at the annual meeting here next Thursday. The local band will furnish music.

We extend our congratulations to those who have taken an active part in the creamery for the past quarter of a century and to all our loyal farmers in this community who have cooperated in making the creamery a big success.

Livestock Shipping Assn. Held Its Annual Meeting

The members of the Holt Cooperative Livestock Shipping association held their annual meeting here on Monday, Feb. 1st in the afternoon. The local association did a pretty good business considering the times we have had the past year.

Two directors were elected at the meeting. They were Oliver Nohre and Fred Voth.

Besides these two there are three more directors on the board. They are John Benitt, Elvin A. Erickson and Harvey Copp. H. Moberg is manager.

We are this week publishing the annual report of the Farmers Co-operative Creamery company and it shows that the institution has done a big business the past year. We also printed the report in booklet form for the secretary to hand out at the annual meeting yesterday.

School Notes

HIGH SCHOOL

The Holt School cordially invites the parents and public to a program commemorating the birth of George Washington on Friday, Feb. 19 at 2 o'clock.

Junior Class: Helen Monson is librarian this week.

History class will continue this week to report on "Builders of America". Those who have reported so far are: Ruth Saastad, Julius Faiman, Oscar Nohre and Chester Larson.

English III students find the study of poetry very interesting even though it is quite difficult.

The English I class have finished the study of Silas Marner.

6th, 7th & 8th GRADES

Gertrude Nohre had a pefect paper in last weeks 7th grade history test.

3rd, 4th & 5th GRADES

We are making valentines in our art class.

The fourth graders have now started an occupation booklet.

1st & 2nd GRADES

The second grade have almost completed their store. They measured out bricks on wrapping paper and colored it red to give the store the effect of red bricks.

Morris cut out letters and made the sign "Grocery Store" for it. The rest of us have made money, vegetables, cans and seed packages. We use our store awhile during arithmetic period to help us in long column addition.

A Letter From J. W. Black

We received the following letter this week from Mr. Black who is president of the Marshall County State Bank here, and are publishing it as follows:

Minneapolis, Minn.
Feb. 8, 1932

Mr. H. O. Hanson,
Holt Weekly News,
Holt, Minnesota.

Dear Mr. Hanson:

I have just read with much interest your article on the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Holt Creamery.

Twenty-five years is a long time. To do one thing for a quarter of a century is an accomplishment. To complete the twenty-fifth year with an all time record must be most gratifying to everyone in your community.

The management of the creamery is deserving of great credit for having accomplished an all time record in the face of a world-wide depression.

In comparison with some activities, the Holt Creamery is small. This present depression has taught us, however, that mere size is no guarantee of strength or quality.

The Holt Creamery has successfully performed a continuous service to its community for twenty five years. It has added to its equipment and service as the needs became apparent. No business, however big, could do more.

I congratulate the management of the creamery on its excellent and enviable record. A continuation of past performances is the best guide for a greater and better record.

Yours very truly,
J. W. Black.

G. Sanoden is employed at the postoffice as assistant to H. B. Young.

Willie Rux has a new Maxwell wood sawing and feed grinding outfit and says he can now do yours job.

Notice for Bids

Sealed bids will be received up to 5 o'clock P. M., on Monday, Feb. 22, 1932, for from four to five cords of dry white poplar wood. Wood to be sawed into stove lengths and to be delivered into the basement of the postoffice at Holt, Minn.

My Dear Sirs:

You certainly will remember when I met you and gave you a talk and then had you all to subscribe shares and then complete the organization. It pleased me very much when I read this clipping:

> CREAMERY 25 YEARS OLD

This was in the Minneapolis Journal tonight and I thought that it would please you all to hear from me. I have been retired for 10 years. I organized 506 creameries up here in 28 years. I get all the daily papers and am watching what is being done. I hope you will have a nice time at the meeting. Kind regards to all and oblige

Yours truly, M. J. CORT,

"Fanny Foley Herself" Is Splendid Film

Its here, this picture so long awaited by admirers of Edna May Oliver, whose work in "Cimarron," "Laugh and Get Rich", and other RKO Radio Pictures' successes, made film fans long to see her in a starring role.

She has such a role herself in "Fanny Foley Herself," which will be shown here on Thursday nite, Feb. 18.

A fine swiftly-moving story of unusual and novel heart appeal, of splendid characterization, good dialogue, and with a wide range of attractive backgrounds, she imparts supreme comedy, leavened with pathos.

Remember that you can now see a good show in Holt every Thursday nite.

Holt Will Have Talking Pictures Every Week

We are pleased to announce that Holt has a new enterpsie. That is a talking picture show. Clifford Moran and G. Overvold of Thief River Falls who are showing one night each week in our neighboring towns, have made arrangements to show here every Thursday night from now on. They have a new and up to-date talkie equipment and judging from the way they started, we are going to have some of the best pictures showed right at home.

Come! See and Hear.

Every business place in town displayed window cards yesterday congratulating the Farmers Co-operative Creamery and its patrons on their twenty-fifth anniversary.

Attended Spelling Contest

Roy Olson of Viking, eighth grade pupil in school district 38, won first place in the Marshall County Rural School Spelling Contest at Warren on Friday.

Those from here who attended were Beatrice Larson and Helen Johnson, pupils in Pioneer and Sunnyside school, Mrs. Fred Peterson and Miss Hermia Saastad, teachers, and Bill Davis, driver.

Rheumatic Pains Relieved this Quick Way

If stabbing pains shoot across your back and cripple you, rub on good old St. Jacobs Oil. Relief comes before you can count 60!... Relief without burning or blistering. This famous oil simply draws out inflammation and pain. It is soothing, healing. For the aches and pains of Rheumatism, Neuritis, Lumbago, Neuralgia or Backache there's nothing so quick or sure to bring relief. Get a small bottle of St. Jacobs Oil from your druggist.

Sudden Change of Plan

We wish to publicly announce that we have given up the idea of buying a dirigible. It isn't the initial expense that discourages us, but the fact that the Akron (Ohio) hangar for the dirigible Akron covers 8½ acres of ground. That convinces us that we have no business owning a dirigible. The hangar at Akron is the largest building in the world without center supports. The building is so large that a sudden change of temperature creates clouds within the building, and occasionally it rains in the building while the skies outside are clear. —Atchison Globe.

CHAPTER XI

Polito Lends a Hand

I shall never forget that scene on the blood-drenched field of Carabobo, when the Liberator went among the scant hundred men that made up the remnant of my Apure battalion, and threw his arms around them, and called them "My boys," and "My children." Or when he stood before the silent, shattered ranks of the British legion, his face working in an emotion he could not control, his eyes unseeing because of the tears he could not hold in check, his voice—for the first time in his life—broken and halting, and called them, "Salvadores de mi patria!" For they had been, indeed, the saviors of his country. That is a picture I shall hold to the end of my days.

It came to me that I was free, too, that now, I could lay down my sword and hark to the call of love. And, dreaming, I saw the pleading eyes of Dulce again, and I heard the caressing tones of her voice, and felt almost the glory of her presence.

Manuel awakened me from this pleasant trance. He stood before me, the bridle of a fine bay mount in his hand.

"Manuel," I said, amazed, "is not this the horse that brought me from Caracas?"

"No other, major; and he can take you just as swiftly to Valencia."

"But why should I go to Valencia?"

Manuel spoke swiftly: "Adolfo de Fuentes escaped, as did most of the Spanish officers, for they fight behind the protection of their men. He may have gone to Valencia—who knows? Colonel Pini, with his cavalry, has been directed to pursue La Torre and Morales, who, with a small body of men, are fleeing toward the safe port of Cabello. Pini's orders are to the effect that, if he does not overtake the Spaniards ere they reach Valencia, he is to take over that city, a task that should please him very much, for the moonlight glances of the Senorita have had a devastating effect upon his heart. He is mad, my friend, and when a man of Pini's caliber is mad about a lady, he is dangerous."

"You bring ill tidings, Manuel."

"Francisco told me many of these things," Manuel continued. "He has approached Bolivar, and he has informed the general that the Americano, who, with so small a force, held firm against the right wing of the Spanish army, requests leave to visit Valencia, and Bolivar has given his permission. Therefore—"

"Would Francisco's knowledge, my friend—which seems, indeed, to cover everything—include the location of the house where the Senorita may be found?"

"Of a surety. It is the home of Senora Ybarra, lying three streets east of the house of the governor—toward the lake. A large house of stone and adobe, tinted brown, with a border of red, and resting on a corner of two streets."

"Ah, Manuel," I said fervently, "if I were less American and more French I would kiss thee."

"Then your American blood has saved your life," said he; "begone!"

Eighteen miles—that was all—eighteen miles on this swift bay horse and I would reach Valencia, would find there the lovely Senorita, would take her in my arms again, for she had told me that her love for me had filled her life. I would crush with passionate kisses the warm willing lips, I would hear her call my name again, and I would look into the purple depths of her eyes and find there a light of love.

The battle we had won had opened up new vistas in my life. Because of our love the Senorita Lamartina belonged to me. I could take her back to the land of moonlight that was my own, back to the fine sturdy gentleman who was my father, and to the gracious lady who was my mother, and to Felice, the slim, exquisite little sister of mine. They would love her, and she would make my country her own.

I entered Valencia from the southwest, and had no difficulty in finding the mansion that had been the habitation of various governors. Manuel's directions proved correct, for I found the red-bordered house of brown that was the home of the Senora Ybarra; in front of which I dismounted, giving the reins into the keeping of a grinning muchacho.

I touched very lightly the knocker of the carved door, for I did not know what the place might hold for me. That the Senorita was there I deemed sufficient, and I was quite willing to take my chances with anyone else. A small brown woman opened the door wide enough to give me careful examination, then she loosed the chain and let me in. The sight of my uniform cleansed the fear from her dark eyes and brought a smile of welcome to her face. She spoke in a cautious whisper: "Have the men of Venezuela taken over the city?"

"Aye, Senora."

"I am glad."

"Will the Senorita Lamartina—?"

Now she was looking at my hair. "You'll be the Americano, Senor Garde?"

I nodded.

"She has spoken of you; she has said you would come—some day."

"Aye, Senora."

I started down the wide hallway, whence had come the murmur of conversation, but she put a hand on my arm. "Wait, I would tell you. One is her brother, the lieutenant—"

"Yes?"

"And the other is he who was commandant of the Venezuela garrison. Is it safe for you to enter?"

"Aye, it is always safe for me to enter wherever the Senorita may be."

We stood listening, in the gloomy corridor, for the voices had became high, belligerent. I could hear, very faintly, the soft sobbing of the Senorita Lamartina, I heard a rasping oath from Adolfo, and an accusing complaint from Polito.

"A fine soldier, Adolfo—you, who leave the field before the battle is over. I saw you, I saw you run like the veriest coward when the llanero cavalry struck us, and—useless as a soldier because of my crippled arm—I followed you, for I knew you would come here to try some devil's trick upon my sister."

"I must protect her," said Adolfo, "for we have lost."

"Aye, we lost; and we should have lost, for the Spanish officers deserted their men. Bah—that a colonel, and a De Fuentes, should run in the face of an enemy. Mother of G—d," he gasped, "can my sister marry a craven, can you expect her to look upon you with anything save loathing?"

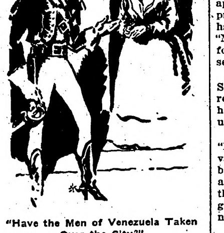
"I told you, Adolfo," Polito continued, "that I would kill you if you tried to force my sister into marriage, and Dulce told you she would marry you when Spain should win in Venezuela." He laughed bitterly. "Spain has lost, my country has lost the western world; because of the stupidity and the cowardice of De Fuentes and La Torre and that murderer, Morales, Spain will have failed in her attempt to build a mighty empire in the New world. All the wealth of this fair land could have made us a great nation, but his majesty, Ferdinand, puts his work here in the hands of cowards!



"Have the Men of Venezuela Taken Over the City?"

"Aye, worse than cowards—cheap tricksters. In Caracas you played an evil trick upon my sister. You and that other liar, Morales, told her that the tall Americano lay in the dungeon, awaiting execution, and that she could save him by going to the altar with you."

Ah, name of a sweet and sacrificing angel! How I loved her for that. A whole life of service could never repay her.

Now Adolfo got in a word or two: "You talk to me thus, lieutenant, you a subordinate officer, talk so to the commandant of the Valencia garrison? A word from me and a firing squad will face you as you stand against a wall, and that word, believe me, shall be given before the sun has set. And the Senorita Dulce, who has held me off with threats and promises, and who has loved secretly this ladrone that she picked up in a New Orleans park—"

"Ah, Dios," the Senorita cried, "Dios!"

Polito laughed. "Colonel Fuentes will give no order for my execution, for such order is out of his province. He is not the commandant of the Valencia garrison."

"Polito, my own," said Dulce, "surely your mind—"

"Not at all, my sister. While the poor deluded Adolfo pleaded with you, and coaxed and threatened, the Venezuelan army has taken over the city of Valencia. He is a prisoner, and I am a prisoner, and I am going to do my earnest best to kill him and take my chances on escape."

I hesitated, not because I was afraid of Colonel Fuentes, but because I believed that the clean courage of this boy would win.

"You have a weapon in your hand, Adolfo, and you should not be afraid to use it. I might tell you that my left hand in my pocket also holds a pistol. You have been a traitor to Spain in your service, and a traitor to honor and decency in your love. If you have a spark of courage left you will use your pistol before I kill you like the dog—"

A deafening report filled the house with thunder, and, an instant later, another shot added volume to the din. Senora Ybarra held to me for support. "It is murder," she gasped, "murder . . . My poor house!"

I heard the choking cry of a man in agony and the crash of a heavy body falling to the floor. I waited for the sound of a voice, waited anxiously. Finally, it came:

"Polito, ah, Mother Mary, Polito!"

"You will notice, my sister," said Polito coolly, "that it was not I who fired first."

As I pushed through the portieres, the knocker clanged loudly on the front door. Dulce screamed at sight of me, for she must have imagined that I was an apparition, then she ran into my arms, sobbing and crying my name.

"Loren, ah, Loren! Polito has killed him, my brother has killed Adolfo!"

Over the shining curls I looked at Colonel Fuentes, who lay motionless in the sprawling posture of his fall. "A good thing, my own," I said; "Polito has only saved me the task of killing him."

I loosed her and Lieutenant Lamartina proffered his weapon to me. "I will be a prisoner, Senor—eh?"

"Yes, Polito, for I fear there will be no chance for your escape. The forces of Venezuela hold the city."

As I stood over the prostrate man, the pistol in my hand, Colonel Pini appeared at the portieres. He approached the Senorita and, cap in hand, offered a deep bow before her. "May I apologize for Maracay, Senorita, for a madness must have possessed me?"

"My mind is closed to Maracay, Senor," she said coldly. Ah, what regal poise of her head, what limitless heights from which she looked down upon him!

He studied the still form of Adolfo. "Pretty quick work, major; you offer valiant service in aiding us to win the battle of Carabobo, and then you rush away to attend a few personal feuds that you have accumulated. I congratulate you—a busier man I have never seen."

I was sure that Dulce would not be safe in the city so long as this man was commanding officer, for the rule of Valencia was martial law, and Colonel Pini himself, for the present at least, was the law. I determined, therefore, to settle my affair with him as quickly as possible.

"Your words of praise warm my heart, Colonel, for I have, as you intimate, made a most excellent beginning; yet there are many important things that I must do."

His eyes narrowed. "Who, may I ask, Garde, will be the next on your list now that you have finished with the estimable Colonel Fuentes?"

"Not so," said Polito. "Major Garde was not—"

"You will be her brother—no?" Pini laughed softly, for there must have been a deal in this situation to please him. "One would imagine that the Senorita Lamartina is well squired."

"Aye, so she is, my colonel," I lied, "and so shall she be. Long ago Adolfo de Fuentes forfeited her regard in such manner as to render a challenge from me imperative. As you can readily see, he has paid most grievously for it. It was my right, Colonel."

Dulce cried out in dismay and Polito bent an astonished look upon me. Nothing could be gained by charging the lieutenant with the death of his commanding officer, and much, I knew might be lost. "The Lieutenant Lamartina," I continued, "was anxious to take from me the honor of defending the Senorita, yet he was a prisoner, and I could not permit it; besides, a soldier may not attack his superior officer—is it not so, my colonel?"

Odd Claims Insurance Companies Had to Pay

The strangeness of some accidents for which insurance companies have been mulcted in the past almost disrupts human belief, says an article in Pearson's Weekly (London). Take lovers, for instance. One man recently received insurance for broken ribs caused by being hugged too endearingly by his fiance. Another young "sheik" held his sweetheart on his lap until his foot went to sleep. When he rose to say good-by, his leg crumpled up under him, and he bumped himself severely. His insurance company paid for the damage. Take a quiet stroll through your neighborhood, and the same puckish spirit of disaster may be conspiring to work you grievous ill. At least, that is what an Exeter policeman must have thought recently, when some cough drops exploded in his pocket, and set fire to his clothes so effectively that the local fire brigade had to be called out in order to extinguish them. It was explained later that the tablets contained chlorate of potash, which had ignited through being rubbed against the lining of his pocket as he walked along on his beat.

The designation direct trade is given to commerce between two nations carried on in vessels of either of those nations. When conducted in vessels of other nations it is termed indirect trade.

News of Minnesota
Events of the week throughout the "State of Ten Thousand Lakes" told in brief form

Pipestone—Pipestone county has 290 Red Cross members.

Bemidji—A three-day program of sports activities was held here.

Mankato—This community's twelfth annual auto show will be February 17, 18 and 19.

Duluth—The gymnasium headquarters of the Duluth Boxing Club was swept by fire.

Fairmont—The village has five lakes and no ice worth cutting. Lack of freezing weath is the reason.

Rochester—The board of education has ordered a 10 per cent cut in school salaries for a savings of $29,000.

Wayzata—The Delano Crows basketball team defeated Wayzata by the score of 29 to 22. This marked the ninth consecutive victory for Delano.

Dawson—Business men of this community removed the snow from the streets and took it to the banks of the river and built ski and toboggan slides.

Winona—The Mississippi river did not freeze over until after the 20th of January. Records here date back to 1856, but never since then has the river been open as long as this winter.

St. Charles—Municipal Judge Salman W. Gleason, 66, Minnesota's oldest active jurist, who recently observed his ninety-ninth birthday, was stricken with bronchial pneumonia. His condition is serious.

Fairmont—The mystery of the "burning lake" was solved when a local oil company reported that 800 gallons of furnace oil had leaked from one of its storage tanks. Its contents ran into Budd lake and caught fire.

Glendive—With cash which has accumulated in its sinking fund, Dawson county has taken up $50,000 of its bonds due in 1940, thereby making a net interest saving of $20,000. The county now has outstanding only $137,000 in bonds.

Minneapolis—The golden cow bell trophy awarded annually by the Dairy club in recognition of outstanding dairy livestock breeding in Minnesota, was presented to the four Schmidt brothers of St. Peter, Holstein cattle breeders at a banquet here.

Crookston—Arrangements have been made to conduct the annual sale of the Red River Valley Holstein Breeders' Association here February 11 in conjunction with the annual Winter Shows. About 50 registered animals will be put on the block at the organization's fourteenth sale.

St. Paul—The Minnesota state highway department expects to pave 400 miles of road each year, starting in 1932 without further bond issues, C. M. Babcock, state commissioner of highways, told members of the Minnesota County Auditors' association at their annual convention at the Nicollet hotel.

St. Paul—Two millstones from an early state mill, erected near Hastings in 1862, soon will adorn the entrance of a University Farm building. The stones were presented to the section of cereal chemistry, division of biochemistry of the department of agriculture of the University of Minnesota, by Mrs. Minnie E. Lee, Spring Lake.

St. Paul—Organization of county units of the Minnesota Association Against the Prohibition Amendment is under way throughout the state, John A. Wright of St. Paul, executive secretary, announced here. Headquarters of the Association have been established in the Minnesota Building. Executives are Charles W. Bunn, St. Paul, President; A. L. Agatin, Duluth and H. J. Partridge Minneapolis, Vice Presidents and Allen Vernon Junkin, St. Paul, Treasurer.

Princeton—Boys and girls in the town schools of Mille Lacs County will have health inspections as a result of the recent Christmas Seal sale. Alma Harvey, field nurse for the Minnesota Public Health Association started the health program January 25 in Princeton. She will later visit Milaca, Onamia, Wahkon and Isle. The work is being sponsored by the Mille Lacs County Public Health Association, of which Mrs. J. F. Petterson of Princeton is chairman.

St. Paul—Eight outstanding rural citizens of Minnesota were recognized as Master Farmers by the Farmer and Farm, Stock and Home at the annual Farmers' and Homemakers' supper in the University Farm dining hall. Those honored, each of whom will receive the Master Farmer gold medal, appropriately engraved are: Martin Bode, Nicollet; C. F. Horihan, Lanesboro; J. R. Johnson, Dorvay; E. H. Knodt, Rich Valley; W. S. Moscrip, Lake Elmo; E. F. McCarthy, Madelia; Emil Nelson, Battle Lake; H. W. Voehl, Lakefield

BABY FRETFUL, RESTLESS?

Look to this cause

When your baby fusses, tosses and seems unable to sleep restfully, look for one common cause, doctors say. Constipation. To get rid quickly of the accumulated wastes which cause restlessness and discomfort, give a cleansing dose of Castoria. Castoria, you know, is made specially for children's delicate needs. It is a pure vegetable preparation; contains no harsh drugs, no narcotics. It is so mild and gentle you can give it to a young infant to relieve colic. Yet it is as effective for older children. Castoria's regulative help will bring relaxed comfort and restful sleep to your baby. Keep a bottle on hand. Genuine Castoria always has the name:

News Review of Current Events the World Over

Japan's Military Seizure of Shanghai Creates Dangerous Situation—China Demands Forcible Steps by League of Nations.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

Dr. W. W. Yen

MORE trouble for the world develops in the Orient. Japan, pushing her campaign to put an end to the anti-Japanese boycott in China and with the added provocation of riotous demonstrations against her Nationals in Shanghai, assembled 24 warships at that great port, and the military occupation of the city was begun by a force of about 3,000 marines. To protect the foreign settlement, four regiments of American marines and several battalions of British troops were standing by, and warships of those nations were hurrying to the scene.

Meanwhile, before the council of the League of Nations in Geneva Dr. W. W. Yen, the Chinese minister to the United States, set forth his country's side of the controversy and demanded that the council enforce the league covenant without delay. In Washington President Hoover and Secretary of State Stimson were considering what America might do in the crisis. They proposed to Great Britain that the two nations apply economic embargoes or boycotts to trade with Japan, but the MacDonald government seemed reluctant to do anything more than to dispatch warships for the protection of the international settlement.

The mayor of Shanghai had yielded to the Japanese demands, but new demands were put forward and immediately thereafter the Japanese marines were landed and proceeded to seize Chapei, the Chinese quarter. As they swept through the district they encountered the desperate resistance of several thousands Chinese troops, whreupon planes were brought into action and Chapei was thoroughly bombed. Conflagrations nearly destroyed the densely populated quarter and the fatalities were undoubtedly heavy. The bloody battle continued for hours and at one time the Chinese defenders had recaptured the important north railroad station. The Japanese had previously made their way across the Whangpoo river to Pootung, site of big Japanese cotton mills, and evidently intended to advance further into Chinese territory. Also they had shelled and occupied Woosung, the fort at the mouth of the Whangpoo. Their warships at the same time had gone up the Yangtse and three cruisers were lying off Nanking ready to shell that capital city. The Chinese Nationalist government was busily mobilizing all its strength and calling on the League of Nations for help. Chiang Kai-shek, former president, was made premier and apparently was virtually the dictator.

WHAT course the United States government would follow was uncertain, but the stiffening of its policy toward Japanese encroachments was indicated by the sending of four more warships to Chinese waters from Manila. They were destroyers and their presence was requested by Rear Admiral Y. S. Williams, commander of the Yangtse patrol.

Secretary Stimson cable to Tokyo asking the intentions of Japan and received what was called a reassuring reply, but it was stated in Washington that President Hoover was proceeding on the theory that Japan would be violating international law if she landed troops on Chinese soil for any purpose but the protection of Japanese Nationals and their property.

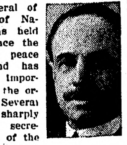
Russia came into the picture again when Japan asked permission to use the Chinese Eastern railway in Manchuria to transport troops to Harbin, where Chinese soldiers were marauding. Russia flatly refused the request, stating it intended to observe neutrality.

WHEN the league council had heard both Dr. W. W. Yen and Naotake Sato, the Japanese delegates, Joseph Paul-Boncour, who replaced Briand as chairman, warned Japan to go easy at Shanghai. He admitted that the situation was grave. Yen not only relies on the nine-power treaty and the Kellogg pact, but he also threatened to invoke Article XV of the league covenant, which is followed by Article XVI, and the latter is the one that provides for sanctions against nations that resort to war. Furthermore, "war" might well be made to cover such operations as those of the Japanese against the so-called Chinese bandits. Some of the nations in the league are mighty timid in the matter of sanctions. Yen in his talk took a stronger position than the Chinese have previously taken before the council and his characterization of the acts of Japan was forcible and uncompromising. He complained, too, about the slowness in the formation of the league's commission of inquiry and in its getting to Manchuria, where it will not arrive until April.

HAVING abandoned the reparations conference in Lausanne, France and Great Britain are still trying to solve the problem without the aid of the United States. Premier Laval in conversation with Lord Tyrrell, British ambassador, suggested a temporary plan, calling for a moratorium on reparations until after the American elections. The moratorium would expire before December 15, when the next French payment to the United States is due.

After the French elections in May and before expiration of the new moratorium a conference would be called at Lausanne or elsewhere to negotiate a permanent agreement. Such a plan would be in line with the American attitude that Germany's reparations creditors agree among themselves before the question of adjusting war debts is broached.

ONE notable result of the whole Manchurian affair is the announced determination of Sir Eric Drummond to relinquish, early next year, his position as secretary general of the League of Nations. He has held that office since the days of the peace conference and has been a most important figure in the organization. Several governments sharply criticized the secretariat because of the extreme position taken by the league at the beginning of the Manchurian embroglio, and some diplomats accused Sir Eric of trying to force the powers into committing themselves to action in defense of the covenant which might have led to war with Japan.



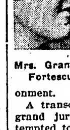
Sir Eric Drummond

Sir Eric was evidently disgusted with what he considered the weak action of the league council, especially at the Paris session, and felt that the league had suffered great loss of prestige. The other league officials do not wish to lose his services and it was considered possible they might prevail on him to change his mind about resigning. This, however, seemed likely only if the council would take a sterner attitude toward Japan.

SEVERE loss was sustained by both the business and the sporting world in the death of William Wrigley, Jr., which occurred at his winter home in Phoenix, Ariz. The Chicago capitalist, known universally as the magnate of chewing gum and the owner of the Chicago Cubs of the National Baseball league, had many other and vast interests, including banks, mines, real estate projects and the moving picture industry. Born in Germantown, Pa., 70 years ago, he ran away at the age of eleven and started business in New York as a newsboy. In 1891 he went to Chicago and formed his own company, which soon began the manufacture of chewing gum and was vastly successful.

All his varied enterprises resulted in bringing Mr. Wrigley a great fortune. Estimates by his associates ranged anywhere from $30,000,000 to $100,000,000. He was the majority stockholder in the $63,000,000 William Wrigley Jr. company, whose earnings in 1930 exceeded $12,000,000.

WHATEVER may be the final outcome, Lieut. Thomas H. Massie of the American navy, his mother-in-law, Mrs. Granville Fortescue, and E. J. Lord and Albert O. Jones, will not have to pay the death penalty for the killing of Joseph Kahahawai in Honolulu, suspected attacker of Mrs. Massie. The four defendants in the sensational case were indicted by the grand jury in Honolulu, but the charge is second degree murder, the penalty for which is 20 years to life imprisonment.



Mrs. Granville Fortescue

A transcript of proceedings of the grand jury indicated that body attempted to make a report earlier and that Circuit Judge Cristy refused it. The transcript revealed he pleaded with them to "lay aside race prejudice," to consider crimes as defined by statutes, not as defined by individuals.

Cristy repeatedly told the grand jurors that whether the accused four should be punished for killing the Hawaiian was a question for the trial jury to decide. The defense attacked the indictment on the ground that the grand jury was coerced by the judge.

DARTMOOR penitentiary, the historic English prison near Plymouth, was the scene of a violent mutiny in which more than 300 convicts fought desperately all one day with the guards and police. The rioters, who were enraged because no sugar was served with their porridge, burned the principal buildings before they were subdued. There were no fatalities, but 95 of the prisoners were wounded.

Wisdom in Advertising When Business Is Dull

There are certain businesses, and comparative ones, too, that show no decline during this period of business depression, either in volume or profit! What is the reason for this? An examination of published financial statements reveals this to be true even in the case of quite a few large retail merchandising corporations. An examination of certain other available figures indicates that these same concerns have not reduced their advertising appropriations during this depression and in many cases have even increased them.

Any business, large or small, that keeps up its advertising in both good times and bad has a powerful advantage over its competitor that reduces or discontinues its advertising! The average business at the first blush of depression begins to cut expenses, and the first item is usually advertising. Its larger or wiser competitor keeps right on advertising in depression and takes what business there is away from the concern that has ceased to advertise. In other words, the concern that does not advertise is out of competition with one that does!

I am not saying that advertising would totally turn the tide of present business conditions—it is not the complete remedy for the disease that besets us, but it would aid to a large degree. At all events, if all competing businesses would continue their advertising, why, the available business in times of depression would be more evenly divided.—David Gibson, in Lorain Journal.

From Bad to Worse

President Shantz, of Arizona university, said at a Tucson tea:

"When racketeers begin to break the law they can't stop. They must go from bad to worse. Otherwise, destruction.

"It's like the boys and the milk.

"Two Tucson boys were carrying home a pitcher of milk.

"'Oh, gosh,' said the smaller one, as he wiped his mouth with the back of his hand, 'we've drunk too much of it. What'll we do?'

"'Do?' said the bigger boy. 'There's only one thing to do now. We must smash the pitcher.'"—Detroit Free Press.

Presumption

Dr. P. K. Olitsky, head of the trachoma research department of the Rockefeller institute, ended a description of the Geneva anti-trachoma conference with a story.

"So to think, even after the germ is found that the malady is conquered," he said—"well, that is to be like the boy in the swimming pool.

"The boy was displaying, one by one, the treasures that were contained in his pockets.

"'And this,' he said, 'this here is a washer—for makin' automobiles.'"

Measuring Atom's Movement

According to J. G. von Hevesy of the University of Freiburg, in Breisgau, all atoms are constantly in motion, even in solid metal. In an alloy of lead and gold, at a temperature half again as high as that of boiling water, the atoms wander through a space of a hundredth of a cubic inch in a day. In pure lead, however, moving about is not nearly so easy; in pure lead an atom can migrate in one day through a space of only two ten-billionths of a cubic foot.

Many Attended Creamery Meeting

Past Business Reviewed at Silver Anniversary

The stockholders of the Holt Farmers Co-operative Creamery company held their twenty-fifth annual meeting in the Community Hall here last Thursday afternoon. The meeting was well attended in spite of the fact that a real snow storm and blizzard cut loose here shortly before noon that day.

With Louis Wegge, president of the board presiding, the stockolders approved the annual report read by T. B. Folden, secretary of the company.

This was the silver anniversay celebration of the company and things were all set to have a big day, but the stormy weather prevented the majority of the patrons of the creamery from coming in to town to take in the meeting.

According to the annual report read by the secretary, the creamery did a big volume of business. The total sales were $76,742.70 for the year and the cost of this was $67,377.87 This left the sum of $9,364.83, which was the total operating expense; and $40.32 was the net gain in operation for the year.

The creamery had an increase in volume of butterfat received of 19,137 pounds over the year of 1930, but the prices on this product have been such that the amount in dollars and cents paid out to patrons was over twenty thousand less then last year.

A. G. McGuire, general manager for the Land O' Lakes plant at Minneapolis and P. L. Anderson of Crookston, now field man for Land O' Lakes in district 14, were the speakers at the annual meeting.

The following prominent dairy farmers of this community were elected to serve on the board of directors: E. O. Waagedahl, F. D. Voth and T. B. Folden. Mr. Folden succeeded himself and the two new members take the place of Mr. Wegge who has been on the board for twenty years and Theo. Sorum who had served for sixteen years and, who was at the present time vice-president of the company.

The local community band which was organized here only a few months ago, played for the celebration at the opening of the meeting. Mr. McGuire stated in his talk that a lot of bands he had heard that had played for several years never did better.

At the present time the local creamery has no debts; it has a complete line of good modern machinery and equipment; also has a surplus of over $14,000.

With dairying coming to the front as it has here the past few years, the outlook for the future of the home creamery is bright.

Heard Rev. Smith

Augustine Elected President

The board of directors of the Farmers Co-operative Creamery here held their first annual meeting on Monday. J. P. Augustine was elected president of the board and Olaus Rodahl was elected vice-president.

T. B. Folden, now the oldest member on the board was reelected as secretary-treasurer.

Quality Cream Pays
If a brand of butter does not suit a buyer's taste, he might turn to butter substitutes, and the whole dairy industry suffers as a result.
You may say, "What can we do about this?" 95 per cent of producing fine butter is in the control of the man that milks the cows. Never in the history of the dairy business has the quality of your cream that you sell to any creamery, counted so much as it does today in regard to the price your creamery will get for their butter.

Geo. Washington Born 200 Years Ago

Monday, February 22, Will Mark Beginning of Bi-Centennial Celebration

George Washington was born two hundred years ago, and now we will celebrate that anniversary of the Nation-Builder.

On Monday, February 22, the nation-wide Bicentenial Celebration of George Washington's birth will be officially inaugurated. It will last from Washington's birthday, February 22 to Thanksgiving Day, Nov. 24 this year with special local and national celebrations everywhere on all holiday anniversaries or other days which can be connected with the life of George Washington.

With features provided especially for observance in the home the school and the church, the Celebration will unite America in a far more impressive and lasting tribute than ever could be accomplished by the most spectacular display of national wealth, power and achievement.

School Notes

HIGH SCHOOL

Parents and friends, remember our Geo. Washington program today, commencing at 2 p. m.

The Junior class has been gathering material on Geo. Washington and Abraham Lincoln for the bulletin board in the library. We want to compliment them on their good work.

Biology Teacher: Name the different foods you had for breakfast and what plant they came from.

Carl: Eggs.

Teacher: That's no plant.

Carl: Yes, the fowl tree.

The English I class has started The Merchant of Venice.

6th, 7th & 8th GRADES

The following poem was written by Lida Monson:

THE EIGHTH GRADE

First there is Gladys, the head of the class;
With an everlasting smile, she's a jolly young lass.
Then Gertie with the motto, "always be good."
She's never mischievous and always does what she should.
And Thelma with a dictionary
trying to be Webster II,
And Gertrude, that's her favorite classmate, I reckon.
Then Clayton, when from school
he does walk
With Gertrude, he will not even talk.
Oh Gertrude, a twin to Gladys is she,
If you want to be artistic, she has the key.
Then Raymond, Oh, he takes English One;
At first it was hard but now it's fun.
Next Ruth, a good writer is she;
She writes so fancy an "h" looks like "t".
Coming last of all is me;
I'm just a "hay-shaker," that's all, you see.

In eighth grade Reading we have been studying short stories by Washington Irving and Mark Twain.

The seventh grade History class has been divided into groups and we are all making an outline booklet of the unit of work just covered.

3rd, 4th & 5th GRADES

Fifth: Opal Werner, Lorna Peterson.

The third and fourth grades have been studying Lincoln and Washington, and have made booklets about them.

1st & 2nd GRADES

Our store is being used daily by the second grade during Arithmetic period. It also came into use for our first grade when they studied politeness in Language.

The second grade have new work booklets in Reading. Each day someone in the class is going to judge the books for neatness.

We have been making Lincoln booklets and are now beginning Washington booklets.

The first graders received another new reader today. It is "The Winston Companion, First Reader."

BANKERS DEVELOP NEW FINANCE AID

President of American Bankers Association Describes Plan and Services of National Credit Corporation

NEW YORK.—The National Credit Corporation, a billion dollar cooperative institution, is the method worked out by bankers to put into practical effect the central point in President Hoover's plan for renewing the commercial and industrial activity of the nation as proposed in his statement to the nation of October 7, Harry J. Haas, president of the American Bankers Association stated in a recent interview.

The corporation is strictly cooperative in character, he said, to unite the entire banking system and increase the effectiveness of the financial services of banks to their communities in rural districts as well as the cities. The plan will marshal the banking resources of the country, he explained, by creating a national institution whose funds will be loaned when necessary to banks which have assets in their portfolios that are thoroughly sound but are not eligible for loans at federal reserve banks.

To Benefit Everybody

"There is no citizen in the United States but will benefit in very practical ways from the results of the operation of this forward-looking plan of cooperation, which may be regarded as one of the most constructive steps that have been taken toward revival of sound business activity," Mr. Haas declared, adding:

"The National Credit Corporation represents an instrumentality that should have far-reaching effect in restoring the confidence of the public. The plan not only has been formulated by the country's leading banking authorities, but also will be carried out locally as well as nationally by banking representatives who have given their time and thought to this undertaking as a real public service.

"The American Bankers Association convention was in session at the time the plan was proposed and unanimously endorsed it in principle. I have examined the detailed formulation of the working plans as developed by the incessant labors of some of the Nation's leading bankers who have undertaken to put it into practical operation in single-minded devotion to the national welfare, and I am able to say without reservation that the National Credit Corporation as set up by them constitutes a practical, sound and efficient means for carrying out President Hoover's proposal."

Notice for Bids

Sealed bids will be received up to 5 o'clock P. M., on Monday, Feb. 22, 1932, for from four to five cords of dry white poplar wood. Wood to be sawed into stove lengths and to be delivered into the basement of the postoffice at Holt, Minn.

Everybody welcome!

We Get Advertised

Practically every daily and big weekly paper in this state and some of the daily papers in adjoining states carried news stories about our creamery celebrating its 25th anniversary.

Our creamery has a record that is hard to beat, and therefore we say that no better advertisement for our community could be done than to have the people of the northwest read all about what has been accomplished here in the past 25 years.

Bad Weather

We had a rather stormy week since last Thursday. On that day we had the worst weather that has been seen here in the last four years. Saturday was not very much better. But it seems to clear up in between days.

Fortunate Gold Seekers

Out of work and with little money, A. N. Foreward and his wife went to Auburn, Calif., from Los Angeles. They had heard about gold mining, but knew little about it. However, they set up a sluice box, had a miner show them how to pick the raw gold, and in six weeks banked dust worth $264. Their sluice was set up in the Last Chance mining district.

Lioness Followed Girls

Escaping from her cage in Earl Shilton, England, Zenita, seven-year-old lioness, quietly followed a crowd of well-fed girls just returning from dinner to a hosiery factory. The girls scattered, but Zenita raided a vegetable garden and was captured later in the factory yard.

RHEUMATIC PAINS
relieved this quick way
If the stabbing pains of rheumatism are crippling you, rub on good old St. Jacobs Oil. Relief comes in a minute! This famous remedy draws out pain and inflammation. SORE THROAT
FIVE minutes after you rub on Musterole your throat should begin to feel less sore! Continue the treatment once every hour for five hours and you'll be astonished at the relief.
This famous blend of oil of mustard, camphor, menthol and other ingredients brings relief naturally. Musterole gets action because it is a "counter-irritant"—not just a salve—it penetrates and stimulates blood circulation and helps to draw out infection and pain. Used by millions for 20 years. Recommended by doctors and nurses.
To Mothers—Musterole is also made in milder form for babies and small children. Ask for Children's Musterole.

"Of course," said Pini absently, "of course." His dark eyes considered Polito, and I imagined that I could read the plan forming in his crafty brain. With the lieutenant as his prisoner he held a powerful card in his game of Woman that he doubtless intended to play, for the Senorita's beauty had cast a spell upon him, and the love she bore her brother might be used. "This lieutenant prisoner of ours, Garde, must be taken to a safe place."

"Aye, my colonel."

"And I fear, almost, to give him in charge of a squad of Indian soldiers, for the men of Venezuela patrol the streets of Valencia, and the life of Lieutenant Lamartina might therefore be endangered. If I may prevail upon you to escort him to the calabozo and to deliver him into the keeping of Captain Lopez—?"

"Assuredly."

Pini thought a moment. "You understand, Garde, that you will be held personally responsible for the prisoner?"

"Have no fear, my colonel."

There was apprehension in Dulce's eyes, and she whispered anxiously, as I bent over her hand: "Do you leave me thus, Loren?"

"I must save Polito," I said softly; "I will return within the hour." I smiled reassuringly. "A little craft, my own, a little guile, and we have won."

She gave me a divine smile, kissed her brother tenderly, and then we went out, leaving the Senorita and Pini together.

"Take hold of my stirrup, Polito," I said, "and walk beside the horse, as a prisoner should."

We traveled two streets eastward and then turned north. "If you are unfamiliar with the city of Valencia, Major Garde, I might tell you that the calabozo lies southeast."

"Therefore we go north, Polito, for I do not like calabozos; and you must be very soon upon the road to Puerto Cabello."

"Senor," he cried, "you cannot do this thing! I cannot permit you."

"It is not that you permit, Polito—you are my prisoner. Your life is in danger, Polito, and because of you, your sister, who loves you, is in deadly danger."

"Perhaps I am stupid," he said.

"Don't you see, my friend? Colonel Pini is at present commandant of Valencia, his word is law. If the fascinating colonel, whose amours are notorious over Venezuela, fails in his attempt to win the favor of the Senorita—as, indeed, he must—he will use your life as a cudgel to compel submission on her part. She loves you, Polito, and, therefore, would save your life at any cost."

"Must we purchase freedom at your expense, Senor?"

I laughed. 'No harm will come to me. Cheer up; I will put you on the road to Puerto Cabello. Then I shall return with all speed to Colonel Pini, who may have other errands for me."

Halting anon, before a tiny fonda, I lifted the fat somnolent storekeeper out of a late siesta by aid of a lusty yell. From him I purchased a simple, two-piece suit of blue, a wide sombrero, and a pair of alpargatas for my prisoner's feet. I helped him transform himself from a lieutenant in his majesty's service to a lowly peon.

"We will look you up, Polito, some day, for peace will come to this unhappy country now. Please remember that Major Garde has killed Colonel Fuentes, so you may go back in safety to your service. If the star of my luck does not forsake me I shall deal definitely with Colonel Pini before another hour has passed. Now—adios."

He took my hand, tears in his eyes, then he turned and bent his steps toward the port of Cabello.

I gave my horse his head and we raced through the streets of Valencia, to the danger of all and sundry, for my mental picture of Pini and the Senorita was not a pleasant one. I had determined, at last, to settle my affair with the clever colonel.

The Senora Ybarra let me in and, as I heard a murmur of voices from the chamber I stopped at the portal and, hidden by the rude portieres, listened. The voice of Colonel Pini was pleading, passionate.

"Do not say no, my lady," he cried; "I was mad with wine that day in Maracay, and for that I offer humble apologies. Every hour since that moment I have been filled with contrition. Will you not listen to my words of pleading, Senorita?"

I heard her frightened murmur, and Pini went on again: "I am a poor slave, Senorita, to my love for thee; I am a moth burned in the flame of thy beauty. May I ask—?"

"No," she said, "no! Ah, Dios—always and for ever—no!"

"When one is mad with love, Senorita, one might do regrettable things. The city of Valencia belongs to me, dear lady; as commandant I hold the power of life and death over those within its limits. For only a small portion of your love that power of life and death will be put into your keeping."

"What do you mean, Senor," she gasped. "Will you tell me, Senor, what is in your mind—ere I go mad?"

"Assuredly; your comely brother, Lieutenant Polito, whom you doubtless love with a sister's sacrificing love, waits even now for the hour of his execution, for Spain has taught us how to deal with prisoners. It may be my desire, as commandant of Valencia, to save him."

"Ah, Mother Mary!" she cried. "Is your design so evil a thing . . . can a man, professing his love, harbor so vile—?" She stopped, her face flaming, slim hands pressed against her bosom, for I had stepped into the room. "Loren," she gasped, "ah, dear G—d, Loren!"

CHAPTER XII

The Lure of Lamartina

"On his knees," I said, laughing, "on his accursed knees—and not, I think, in prayer!"

Pini leaped to his feet, black anger written large on his face. Forgetting the presence of the Senorita, he rasped a potent oath.

"Oh, my colonel, I would apologize for thee!"

"Give yourself no trouble, major, I will make my own apologies. If I should order you to report yourself under arrest to the officer of the calabozo—"

"I would be compelled to refuse, colonel, for I do not know the way to the calabozo." Which was a stupid and tactless thing to say, for I should have kept him in ignorance of Polito's escape.

Dulce gasped, and I continued: "Besides, General Bolivar, in your presence, gave me his permission to offer challenge to you after the battle of Carabobo should be won. We have won that contest, therefore, I am asking now for the pleasure of our postponed meeting."

"You have a sword," said Pini, smiling.

"Aye, my colonel, and the opportunity to use it shall afford me a fine delight."

The wily colonel knew, of course, that my wounded arm would take from me at least one-half of my efficiency as a swordsman, and acting as usual upon impulse, I had given no thought to my injury, or to anything, in fact, except my wild desire to kill him.

"If you do not know the way to the prison," he inquired, "this young lieutenant brother of the Senorita—"

"Is entirely out of your reach, Senor, which leaves the Senorita free to act as the dictates of her heart shall indicate."

Now she ran into my arms. "Loren, my own, you should not have done it. He will make you pay. Ah, dear heart, it is a noble thing for you to do, yet your life—Your arm, dear heart, you cannot handle a sword with a wounded arm."

I smiled upon her confidently. "My arm is well."

"The Senorita then, shall witness a duel," said Pini, who, during our "aside," had written a note. He thrust his head out of a window and emitted a shrill whistle, whereupon a sergeant and a squad of twelve soldiers marched into the room.

The colonel proffered this note to the subofficer. "That, sergeant, is an order for the execution of Major Garde, who stands before you. If, after our duel, the major is still alive, he is to be taken under guard to the calabozo, where, as early tomorrow morning as light may permit, he will be shot."

Dulce clung to me, sobbing softly.

"This note explains to the commanding officer of the prison that Major Garde has permitted—aye, aided—a Spanish prisoner, Lieut. Polito Lamartina, to escape; a prisoner that I, commandant of Valencia, gave into his keeping." Pini turned to me. "Have I spoken truth, Senor?"

"Exactly, my colonel; I could not have expressed it better myself."

"You will station your soldiers along the walls of this room," Pini directed the sub-officer, "and you will offer no interference to our duel."

"Yes, Colonel," said the sergeant.

The room was quickly cleared, and we confronted each other in the center of it. Dulce stood by the ornate mantel, one hand upon it to support herself, the other pressed against her heart, her face pale, lips parted, and a haunting fear in the deep blue eyes.

I turned to face her, and raised my blade in salute. "You will see me, dear one," said I in French, "win another contest with the sword."

"Please God, Loren," she whispered.

"Aye, my colonel, the prize is worth our best efforts." I knew that, losing, I should leave her helpless. The morrow, with its firing squad, gave me no uneasiness; it was with this hour that I had to deal.

"Then guard, Senor."

His overconfidence, because of the weakened state of my right arm, might, I imagined, be a handicap to him, so I permitted him to beat down my guard in the first wild, thrusting attack that he made, parrying only enough to protect my body from his drives.

He was a good, but not a master swordsman, and—but for my injury—he would not have been in any sense a match for me. I must use, therefore, defensive tactics until he should tire, for greater strength and greater endurance was mine.

He laughed aloud, for I think he felt the weakness of my wrist, the former strength of which had been my pride. I could only offer my blade in parry, yet I kept his point away from me, for I was quicker on my feet than he, and I had a more complete control of my body.

I caught the Senorita's eye, and smiled reassuringly, yet she must have seen my helplessness, for there was no answering smile on her face—only that expression of haunting terror. And a new and reckless determination possessed me. I would win because I must win, I would kill this man if I had to do it even after his steel had found my heart.

My benumbed arm grew weaker, so that I could barely feel the blows that I tried to parry. Had I not twisted my body in swift, ridiculous gestures his point would have found me a dozen times.

He cried out in vexation: "Do you fence, Senor, or do you thus take your afternoon exercise? Stand up and fight. Are you unfamiliar with the sword?"

He attacked furiously, and I must needs retreat before his wild frenzy, keeping clear of the walls, and offering ineffectual parry until my arm had lost its vigor and my wrist its power to turn his blows. The weapon, wrenched from my grasp, fell, clattering to the floor, and Pini drove at my chest.

Realizing that I was unarmed, he drew back, waiting. "Pick it up, Garde, I do not stab a defenseless man."

Yet I think, but for the presence of the Senorita, he would have done so. I knew that, as far as fencing might be concerned, my right arm would never save me, so I gripped the hilt of the sword with my left hand. My left arm and wrist would be, I was sure, inept, but they would lack no tithe of strength, and strength might be, after all—in a contest with as unskilful a duelist as the colonel—sufficient.

As his dashing charges became more deliberate, and the force of them relaxed, my confidence increased, for the professional smile had left his lips, his dancing eyes grew somber, and a pallor of fear touched the olive of his face.

Then I advanced in attack, slashing and thrusting with no skill but with a deal of power, for the blows that he parried shook him from heel to crown. "Had I one arm only, my colonel, you should have vanquished me with ease—but now—"

He gasped a fervent oath, and I continued: "You would leave an order for my execution—eh, my sophist—and Providence has ordered yours. You would sell to the Senorita the life of her brother? A clever scheme, and worthy of you."

"Carraca!" he gasped. He made one last, incautious lunge at me and missed. The impetus of his falling body drove my point into his chest. He went to his knees, his fingers fastened around the naked blade. "That order of execution, sergeant," he cried, "you will see to it; you will take him to the calabozo, and tomorrow morning—as early as light—as—as—early . . ."

He crashed, face down, upon the floor, and the sword broke under the impact of his fall.

Now I felt the Senorita's arms around my neck, felt the tender touch of her lips, and I heard her voice calling my name over and over again.

Word "Camera" Derived From Renaissance Toy

The primitive Aryan root "kam" meant "to bend," and the Greek "camera," derived from it, was used to denote anything with an arched cover or roof. Hence came the Latin "camera," meaning "a room," and ultimately, through French, the English "chamber." A common toy of the rich in Renaissance times was a dark room letting in light only through a small lens, which threw an inverted image of the scene outside on the wall opposite it. This was called a "camera obscura" or "dark room." The problem for the inventors of photography was to make permanent the image in the "camera obscura"; hence the instrument with which they ultimately accomplished it was called a "camera."—Exchange.

Island Bird Sanctuary

St. Kilda, a lonely island some seven miles in circumference off the outer Hebrides, has been sold by the former owner, Sir Reginald MacLeod, to an ornithologist who wishes his identity to remain hidden. This buyer plans to keep the island in its natural state so it may remain an ocean sanctuary for the sea birds which migrate there in great numbers. Under the terms of the proposed plan it will be possible for tourists to land and visit the huge island aviary, but no buildings will be placed on the land.

Possible Now to See Washington "the Man"

Now that Prof. Albert Bushnell Hart says again that George Washington swore during a cabinet meeting, there is a double indictment against him. He also swore during the Revolution. It is said that on one occasion he threw his hat to the ground in a fury and jumped up and down on it, uttering strong talk the while. The more sacriligious of the historians say that he was even vulgar occasionally. It is known that he drank in moderation, played cards for money, went to cock fights and raced horses, as all men of his station in life did during the Eighteenth century in Virginia. The best word picture of him done by anybody, that of Thackeray, shows a Washington not greatly unlike the contemporaries.

In history, as in art and religion, there are fundamentalists and modernists. The writers of the latter group go much too far in their efforts to "humanize" him. They distort him into cheapness and vulgarity. The fundamentalists still put a hatchet in his hand and make him innocent of even a white lie. Professor Hart and Thackeray are on the middle ground.

As the Parson Weems version of Washington prevailed while the middle men of today were coming to maturity, the silly old legends still prevail. They are dying hard, but they are dying. In another 20 or 25 years there will be a far better conception of this gigantic figure as he really was—"the first, the last, the best"—neither a plaster saint nor a devil-may-care.—Boston Herald.

Millions Thrown Away by Wasteful Methods

How much water is wasted by a dripping tap? An answer was provided when New York decided to levy a fine of two dollars for every tap found leaking. In two years 40,000,000 gallons of water were saved. It seems absurd to worry about the amount of steam wasted when a locomotive blows a whistle. But Doctor Foley of Indiana university has calculated that 2,434,026 tons of coal are consumed annually in generating steam to blow United States locomotive whistles, and that if the whistles were moved slightly forward and adapted to a single high-pitched note, more than 1,000,000 pounds a year could be saved. But this loss is small compared with that involved in throwing into the dustbin cinders that would still give a lot of heat. It is estimated that a third of the cinders thrown away retain from 50 to 70 per cent of their heating value.

Benson—Outstanding incidents in the life of George Washington will be depicted here in a pageant, a feature of the local observance of the George Washington bicentennial, at the high school auditorium, February 22.

St. Paul—Government crop statistic reports for 1931, recently completed, show Minnesota farmers last year were 61 per cent better off than in 1911 whereas the rest of the country's farmers were 1.03 per cent worse off.

St. Charles—Municipal Judge Salman W. Gleason, Minnesota's oldest active jurist, who recently observed his ninety-ninth birthday, died here from bronchial pneumonia. He was stricken just two weeks before he passed away.

St. Paul—A half million trees will be planted throughout the state in 1932 by Minnesota legionaires of 467 posts, Parker O. Anderson, state legion conservation chairman and in charge of forestry extension at the University Farm, said here.

Minneapolis—One hundred twenty-five have been born in Minneapolis on that unusual birthday, February 29, since 1904, records in the health department disclose. Leap year children in 1904 totaled 19, in 1908, 9; in 1912, 5; in 1916, 20; in 1920, 31; in 1924, 28, and in 1928, 13.

Duluth—Minnesota will have at least 4,000 square feet of space for exhibits at the Century of Progress exposition in Chicago next year, S. V. Saxby, Duluth, chairman of the Minnesota world's fair commission, announced here.

Fairmont—Martin county taxpayers, who to date have with the assistance of the county board and other taxing units slashed more than $150,000 from this year's taxes, recently assailed school expenses, the largest item of their tax bill.

TAKING "TIME OUT" FOR MENTAL REST

Idleness May Constitute a Virtue at Times.

Many people are afraid of introspection. To the average American up-and-comer, meditation and idleness are sins of the first water. To be active, continually and unceasingly active, is to prove one's worth to the world. And yet, without discrediting activity, it can easily be proven that most great men and most men of unusual accomplishment are at times as physically idle as any statue in a public park. They take time out to think, to meditate and to let their minds wander.

Gandhi, the man who probably is wielding the greatest influence upon the earth today, sets aside one day a week in which he keeps silent while he listens to others, or to his own inner voice; while he meditates and ponders and lets the accumulated problems of the last seven days sink deeply into his brain. The story is told of a young executive who so irritated his subordinates by sitting and looking out of the window day in day out that they complained to the president of the company. The president heard them out and then said: "The young man of whom you complain once thought up an idea which has earned for this company more than $1,000,000, and he did it while looking out of the window." A similar tale concerns a rising young Broadway producer. He never is in his office, but spends most of his time sitting in an easy chair at home. Once or twice a year he develops an idea which, when put into action, brings him and the people associated with him thousands of dollars.

It is not the purpose here to encourage indolence. We merely seek to emphasize the value of thought and of frequent periods of mental, rather than physical, activity. They are good for the soul and good for the brain. Sunday is the day when most people can best take advantage of the opportunity to live quietly, to rest and gather strength for the work of the coming week, to think on what has happened and what has been accomplished and upon what is to be done. Aside from its religious [illegible]ance, Sunday is valuable to [illegible] beings. It represents the closest [illegible]ch that many of them have to a [illegible]lence.—Ohio State Journal.

Marriage Easy in Poland

Young lovers in parts of Poland have adopted a motto of "marriage without priest, incense or vodka." The new ceremony consists merely of the swearing of an "oath" before a local Communist worker, who then declares the marriage valid. An Ukrainian newspaper of communistic tendencies publishes the names of those thus united.

States' Bear Populations

California had the biggest number of bears in national forests in 1930, having 8,984 black bears and a number of grizzly bears reported. This is as near to a definite census of bears as can be reached in this country. Alaska had 5,750 black bears and 2,800 grizzly and Alaskan brown bears.

Hubby—They're immense!

Mother of 7—Still Young

Her system doesn't stagnate; her face doesn't age. She has the health and "pep" that come from a lively liver and strong, active bowels.
When you're sluggish and the system needs help, don't take a lot of "patent medicines." There's a famous doctor's prescription for just such cases, and every druggist keeps this standard preparation. It is made from fresh laxative herbs, active senna, and pure pepsin. Just ask for Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin. Take a little every day or so, until every organ in your body feels the big improvement.
The next time you have a bilious headache, or feel all bound-up, take this delicious syrup instead of the usual cathartic. You'll be rid of all that poisonous waste, and you haven't weakened the bowels. You'll have a better appetite, and feel better in every way. The constant use of cathartics is often the cause of a sallow complexion and lines in the face. And so unnecessary!
Would you like to break yourself of the cathartic habit? At the same time building health and vigor that protects you from frequent sick spells, headaches, and colds? Get a big bottle of Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin today. Use often enough to avoid those attacks of constipation. When you feel weak and run-down or a coated tongue or bad breath warns you the bowels need to be stimulated. Give it to children instead of strong laxatives that sap their strength. It isn't expensive.

Odd "Cemetery"

A grewsome discovery has been made in the San Bernardino church in Milan. An underground choir loft was accidentally opened by the workmen. In the choir seats were the skeletons of the monks, who formerly used the church attached to their monastery. It was the custom to bury the monks sitting up in the stalls.

PROPOSED INCOME TAX

In recent years, much has been written and spoken concerning taxes. The majority of sentiment expressed seems to be that taxes are excessive and should be reduced or preferable done away with.

To anyone cherishing such sentiments, here is a piece of good news: Tax experts have found that any tax carried to excess is self-destructive as a source of revenue. Unfortunately, however, the excessive tax becomes self-destructive by destroying the value of the class of property upon which it is imposed.

In Minnesota tangible property bears 98.5 per cent of the entire tax burden. Tangible property includes all personal and real property, such as farms, homes and factories.

As far as farm property is concerned, the tax is rapidly destroying itself. While we have not as yet progressed as far as Michigan where in recent years one-fourth of all real estate has been abandoned for taxes; still we have reached the point where each session of the legislature finds it necessary to take over several northern counties and designate them as state forest reserves. In this manner alone are county bankruptcy and repudiation of indebtedness averted, as taxes in these counties can no longer be collected and the process of self-destruction is complete.

As one unit after another crumbles and gives up the ghost, the tax burden formerly borne by them must be added, to the load of the remaining units, and so the process is speeded up all along the line. Such is the condition as regards farm property, while homes and other real estate are but a step behind. What wonder then that there is demand for lower taxes!

Any movement along this line is worthy, any effort laudable, but the fact remains that comparatively slight relief can be expected from them at this time. Much of our expense is fixed (interest, salaries, etc.) and cannot be suddenly reduced or done away with. While occasional items may be slashed, others, such as unemployment relief, may require increases and it is probable that for the next few years we shall require as much revenue as in the immediate past. To our way of thinking there is but one solution to the harrassing problem of tax equalization and that is the income tax. It is generally conceded that the fairest basis of taxation is the ability to pay. Income is certainly the most accurate barometer of ability to pay.

A recognized tax authority has prepared figures on incomes from various sourses in Minnesota and taxes paid by them for state, county and local purposes.

1. From intangible property (stocks, bonds, etc.) are derived annualy an income of 130 million. This represents 8 per cent of the total income from all sources and pays 1.5 of the total tax.

2. Tangible property (real and personal) produces an annual income of 400 million. This is one-fourth of the total income from all sources and pays 98.5 per cent of the total tax.

3. The third source of income (salaries, commissions, and fees) is by far the greatest. Income from this source is $1,070,000,000 annually or 67 per cent of the total income from all sources. This class of income pays no tax in Minnesota. There is, however, $28,000,000 paid annualy in federal taxes of which the above item pays about $18,000,000.

If we attempt to equalize the tax burden in Minnesota on an income basis, we find that the total tax for all puposes, including the federal, represents 10.5 per cent of the total income. On this basis the first item (intangible property) should pay about seven times as much as it does or about $9,000,000 more than it does.

The second item (tangible property) pays 3.5 times as much as it should or, in other words, pays $193,000,000 too much in taxes.

Item number three, if it paid its equal share on this basis, should pay $93,000,000 more than it now does.

On Friday, Feb. 12, we enjoyed a very pleasant party. After our valentines were distributed we played games. Then we had a very nice lunch. Even though it was very stormy, only four pupils were absent. Our visitors were Carrie Lunke, Milton Conklin and Betty Swan. Our valentine box was a huge red heart.

Our "Washington and Lincoln" program will be given on Friday Feb. 19. We would like to see many visitors. Please come early to visit our classes. The program will commence at 2 o'clock.

The History classes have finished units of work the past week so they will write review tests this week.

The seventh and eighth grades have now finished their required work and will begin a thorough review. The fifth graders have completed the study of Revolutionary Heroes.

HARD TIMES RENEW BANKER'S OPTIMISM

Former Bankers' Chief Finds Much in Past Year to Inspire Confidence in Financial Reliability

ROME C. STEPHENSON, retiring president of the American Bankers Association, declared in an address on the expiration of his term of office that, in travelling about among the banks from one end of the country to the other during the past year, he had "come out of it with a renewed faith in the strength of our banking structure and our banking situation, and a renewed faith particularly in the spirit and courage of the men in the banks that have enabled them to rise unconquered over difficulties such as men never had to face before, or to accept with fortitude misfortunes that were beyond human power to prevent."

When he reflected, he said, that the "entire human economic structure has been brought to the verge of ruin under the difficulties that have swept over not only the nation but the entire world, and that the results of events of this kind react with particular directness upon the stability of our banks, and yet how few have succumbed, we may well renew our confidence in the banks of America; when we think also of how many of our bankers have stood up under the stress and storms of these times and how relatively few of them have been proved wanting in the series of crises that have assailed them, we may well feel a sincere pride in our fellow bankers." He added:

"So I come out of this year of somber experiences not as a pessimist, but as an optimist—as one with a renewed faith and confidence in the spirit of his fellow men under overwhelming difficulties. And particularly do I come out of this year as a banker who is proud of his fellow bankers for the undaunted way in which they have met their part of the great test through which the times have put the nation. I believe that this year has brought new honor to our banking traditions and our banking profession and has won for the banker new title to the faith and trust of all classes of his fellow citizens."

Drive to Release "Frozen Assets" Begins This Week

The nationwide drive to bring money out of hiding and put it to work will begin this week. This is a campaign suggested by the U. S. Treasury Department with the approval of President Hoover to bring money out of hiding and put it to work.

"Idle dollars do not employ labor or provide markets," said President Hoover in announcing this nationwide campaign.

Secretary Mills of the U. S. Treasury says that upwards of $1,500,000,000 in currency has disappeared from circulation during the last two years. The supposition is that this money has disappeared as a result of uncertainty as to investment. The theory of the campaign is that if uncertainty as to investment took this money out of circulation, confidence in a good investment will bring it back.

The government will provide a bond issue in small denominations, and those will be offered for sale.

The president announces it is not desired that people withdraw money from banks to purchase these bonds, but that idle money be used in the purchase. As a matter of fact, money in banks is the best working capital of the community because it is the money that is available for the use of those who need it.

Details of the campaign are not fully developed yet, but will be announced shortly.

Quality Cream Pays
If a brand of butter does not suit a buyer's taste, he might turn to butter substitutes, and the whole dairy industry suffers as a result.
You may say, "What can we do about this?" 95 per cent of producing fine butter is in the control of the man that milks the cows. "The Cathedral of the Movies"

NEW YORK, long our greatest theatrical center, has now gone in for great movie palaces and capped the climax recently when the largest and most unique film parlor in the world was opened.

Built of stone, terra cotta and brick, it is approximately 200 feet square, 115 feet high, seats 6,000 persons—the foyer, accommodating 4,000 more, can be emptied in three minutes, and cost about $8,000,000.

The organ has three consoles, providing for a range of musical production which probably never before was attempted on any organ. In addition to the consoles, the orchestra pit accommodates 110 musicians and disappears mechanically.

The comfort of the visitor seems ever to have been in mind when the plans were made. There is more room between the seats; from every orchestra seat one looks down on the stage without having to crane his neck; a patented effect makes the figures on the screen "stand out;" the auditorium is lighted by reflection from the stage, even while films are being shown and the entire interior is done in one color, gold, which makes for both beauty and restful eyes; special ventilating appliances make for ideal temperature in winter; a mechanical cooling system is calculated to make it the coolest place in town in summer.

Eight sculptors and 300 artists provided the decorations—1,100 tons of plaster and lime and 500,000 feet of wire being among the materials used.

The estimated cost of operation is $50,000 weekly. If every seat was filled at every performance the box office receipts would approximate $185,000 weekly.

CHAPTER XIII

A Night of Madness

In the ancient calabozo of Valencia I stood upon the edge of a rough-hewn bunk and, holding to the iron bars of the window, watched a red sun go down behind the hills of Barquisimeto.

Alone and facing my last night of life, I lived, in fancy, through the swift passage of events that had filled the few short weeks since that night of moonlight madness in New Orleans. In actions, in emotions, in love and hate and fear, I had lived a long life in that brief space. I had met brave and honorable men whose friendship had proved a blessing to me; I had made enemies who had filled my soul with a passion for killing; I had seen patriotism in its highest form, had watched a man win an empire; aye, had assisted, even, in the winning of it, and I had spent my life in the service of a lovely lady. And I was carrying away with me to another—and surely more beautiful—world the blessing of her love.

Dulce herself had called my love a madness. Well . . . if madness might glorify one's life with such emotional bliss, then madness was indeed a blessing, and sanity a futile thing. It had been born, I remembered, all at once—that love for the Senorita. She had come, like an angel, out of the mellow moonlight, and love had overwhelmed me in an instant.

My worship had brought me here, here to a gloomy house of horrors which I would leave at dawn to face the rising sun and a file of armed soldiers. Yet I was glad of my service to the Senorita. Her brother was safe, and free of the menace of Colonel Pini, she was doubtless safe. Pini I had vanquished, yet Pini's dead hand reached out to crush me. How strangely doth fate direct our destiny, for, between two suns, the Senorita Lamartina should lose three suitors for her hand.

I laughed aloud at the sheer absurdity of the thing, and turning back to the iron door, found the guard standing there, tapping upon it. "Can you laugh at such a time, Senor?"

"Why not?"

"Is not a laugh easier to fashion?"

He considered it. "Who knows?" He brightened up. "I have news. News of interest and profit to the Senor Americano. I would tell you, Senor, of a thing that shall give you freedom. He has returned, Senor."

"He," I questioned; "not Pini, Pablo, he could never—?"

"Mother of G—d!" Pablocito gasped, crossing himself again. "I hope he may never return!"

"Then—?"

"The young Spanish lieutenant, he whom you aided to escape."

"No, Pablo," I cried, "no; he could not have done a thing so foolish!"

"A glorious thing, Senor."

"Aye, Pablo," I said humbly, "a glorious thing indeed."

So the brave Polito, to save me, had made the great sacrifice. Ah, a miserable time for Dulce, for she loved that handsome brother. "What does he say, Pablo?"

"After the darkness had settled," the guard explained, "this young lieutenant appeared at the iron gate and demanded admittance. He told us that the Americano, Major Garde, had taken his personal bond until ten o'clock, so that, under cover of the night, he might make his way safely to the calabozo, for the streets of Valencia are filled with Venezuelans celebrating our great victory at Carabobo.

"So, if the Senor has not aided in the escape of the Lieutenant Lamartina, but has merely put him on parole for a few hours, he will surely not be shot tomorrow morning. If the prisoner has returned, how may they shoot you?"

"How indeed, Pablo?"

"You do not seem glad, Senor."

"No, Pablo, for the boy has thrown his life away."

"A brave man," said Pablo, who seemed less sympathetic than happy. "I have locked him up and I am going now to report the occurrence to Captain Lopez, commandant of the prison. He will see to your release—is it not so, Senor?"

"I suspect that he will, my little Pablo. Can you not bring the lieutenant here and put him in this cell with me?"

"Assuredly; a little moment, Senor."

I waited, horror in my heart, for his return. I knew that this would give me back the Senorita, yet, if she lost her brother . . . Ah, the glory, and the pity, of the thing!

They stood in the narrow hallway, vague figures in the ineffectual light. Pablo unlocked the door, thrust into my cell a uniformed figure and slammed the door shut again. "I will return, Senor," he said.

I waited until the sound of his departing footsteps died away in the gloom, then I took the counterfeit lieutenant in my arms. "Always, Senorita, you find me in a prison."

"Loren, ah, Loren, I love thee . . . I cannot live without thee!"

I removed the futile bandage from her right arm and she put it, with the other, around my neck; so, holding each other close, we lived the swift sweet minutes, oblivious to storms, or wars, or prisons.

"You thought to trick me, eh?"

She laughed lightly.

"That clever subterfuge could never have been repeated, for there is a glory in the air where you abide. I can feel it, my love for you—"

"Your love was ever a madness, Loren; it is such a thing that makes a saint."

"Yet no greater joy could ever come to me."

She sighed. "It is so dark, dear heart," she whispered; "I want to see your hair, I want to see the love-light in your eyes—the light of worship that makes a woman happy—and I want to see you smile again."

"And I, dear heart, would look again upon the beauty of your eyes, would see into the purple depths of your eyes, would watch—and envy—tiny shining curls that caress—"

"Ah, my moon-wraith, how sweet a satisfaction is your love!" She laughed happily. "Love has never come to you before?"

"No, my own, and when it came it filled the world with glory."

She was silent a moment, and I knew she visualized that night of madness before the Cabildo. "You seemed a wild thing in the silver moonlight, Loren."

"And you were a queen."

"Your eyes were full of dreams—you seemed only half real."

"And your eyes turned the silver light to purple."

"You—you loved me then, Loren?"

"Aye, that instant. I think some gentle Providence put me there—to wait for you to come."

"You brought something, Loren, out of a chivalrous world, to lay before me; the gift of courage, my fine Americano—a thing so rare in this world."

"A poor thing, my own."

"We notice courage, Loren, we—we worship it, and the man who possesses it requires little else."

I laughed ruefully. "I have little else—if, indeed, that, and that which you consider courage may be only recklessness."

"Yet you met Adolfo."

"An indifferent swordsmen."

"And you came to our aid on the Santa Lucrecia."

"A little thing."

"And you saved me from the storm and brought me to my brother."

"Humph."

"And you braved the perils of Caracas to see me."

"Where a lady offered herself in sacrifice to save a man, who, though professing love, could not penetrate a simple masquerade."

"It is forgiven," she said softly, "all of that is forgiven."

"Yet I should have known you."

"At Maracay you saved me from Colonel Pini, who held a pistol that was pointed at you heart."

"Pini was ever a coward."

"With three hundred natives you held in check a thousand trained soldiers of Spain. Was that not courage?"

"My bravos had been trained to fight."

"To save me again you offered challenge to Colonel Pini, knowing that your arm—"

"Pini was never a swordsman."

Now she was sobbing softly in my arms. "And you took Polito to a place of safety, returning to offer yourself—"

"Oh, my sweet, don't cry; we should be happy, for we have this hour, and—"

"Ah, dear G—d, Loren, is it any wonder that I love you?"

"It is a wonder to me—and a cause for gratitude. Tell me how you played this trick upon the guards."

This brought another quick transition, for she laughed gaily and, dropping her voice into a burring huskiness that was almost masculine, said, "I am Lieut. Polito Lamartina, of his majesty's service, a prisoner in charge of Major Garde, who placed me on parole until ten o'clock tonight, when I am to report myself to the calabazo. I am here."

"Now that you are," said I, laughing at her masquerade, "what?"

"It is all too simple, Loren; the guard has gone to seek Captain Lopez, who, because of the return of the prisoner who was in your charge, will release you."

"Of course, Dulce—and then?"

"After that, dear heart, there is no more, for the morning sun should find you near the coast—and safety."

"And you?" I questioned, deep humility in my soul that this beautiful lady should offer so great a sacrifice.

"Yet tomorrow's sun would find you here."

"Assuredly. A small matter indeed."

I knew the matter was not so small, and I was sure, too, that she knew it. "Will you disappear, then, with the coming of day—like a wraith of the night—or will they find you here?"

"I shall be here, Loren. Tomorrow morning when they come to shoot the tall handsome Americano they will discover only a woman weeping because her lover is far away."

Now I kissed her again, and held the trembling form close to me, and I offered up a prayer of gratitude for such a love as the Senorita had bestowed upon me. "There is not another, my own, in all the world like you; none so beautiful, none so gracious, none with a love so willing to sacrifice. This hour with you is worth—"

"What do you mean, Loren?" she cried, clinging to me desperately. "Is it that you will not—?"

"I cannot."

"Yet you offered your life for Polito."

"Of course."

"If Polito had known, Loren, he would never have gone; if he knew now he would come back."

"Assuredly, my own, for Polito is your brother—and a brother of the Senorita Lamartina could not be aught but a brave and gallant gentleman."

"Ah, Loren, I am so happy . . . My moon-wraith! I had hoped that this nightmare of murder might miss us, I had hoped that I might go with you to the peace of your beautiful land and there we might find our heart's desire, there live out our lives together, there fulfill this love that God has given us."

At this I was silent, for nothing I could say would help. And as we waited in close embrace the clatter of shod feet and the voice of the garrulous Pablocito came out of the gloom: "I have put them in the one cell, captain; it was the wish of Major Garde."

"Courage, my sweet," I whispered, as she fell to trembling; "we must face unafraid that which may come to us."

"Bless you, Loren!" She stood, straight and slim, as the two men stopped beside my cell. A key rasped in the lock, the heavy door swung open and Captain Lopez entered.

"I would get the straight of this, Major Garde."

"A simple task, my captain."

"If this Lieutenant Lamartina was placed on parole by yourself, and he has returned voluntarily, you have not aided in his escape, for there has been no escape; therefore, the charge—"

"The charge against me, my captain, should remain unchanged, for this is not Lieutenant Lamartina."

John Wesley's Thunder Against "Costly Silks"

I conjure you all who have any regard for me, show me before I go hence that I have not labored in vain for half a century. Let me see, before I die, a Methodist congregation full as plain dressed as a Quaker congregation. Only be more consistent with yourselves. Let your dress be cheap as well as plain. Otherwise you do but trifle with God and me and your own souls. I pray let there be no costly silks among you, how grave soever they may be. Let there be no Quaker linen, proverbially so-called for their exquisite fineness; no Brussels lace, no elephantine hats or bonnets, those scandals of female modesty.

It is stark staring nonsense to say, "O, I can afford this or that." No man living can afford to waste any part of what God has committed to his trust. And it is far worse than simple waste to spend any part of it on gay or costly apparel.—From John Wesley's Sermons.

Missionaries

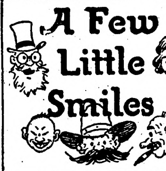
The Missionary Research library says that slightly more than half of the foreign missionaries are not sent from the United States and Canada. They go for most part from Great Britain, Germany, Holland, France, Switzerland, Scandinavia, South Africa, Australia and New Zealand.

Famous Rooms Reproduced

Rooms famous in literature were a feature of the Ideal Homes exhibition held in London. They were reproduced in detail, and were visited by large crowds. There were shown the Boar's Head tavern in Eastcheap in Shakespeare's day, with Falstaff in great form; Little Dorrit's bare garret in Southwark; Sherlock Holmes' foggy Victorian room in Baker street; a drawing room from "Pride and Prejudice"; Trilby's studio, with its long sloping window overlooking the romantic roofs of somewhere near the "Boule Mich.," and the hut millions have so often pictured and longed to live in, the home of Robinson Crusoe.

World's Christians

The total number of Christians in the world is estimated at about 682,400,000, about one-third of the total population.



IN HIS OWN COIN

Sharp, the noted lawyer, looked very worried.

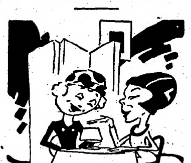
"This business of defending criminals is getting beyond a joke," he told his clerk.

"Anything wrong, sir?" asked the clerk.

Sharp sighed wearily.

"Yes," returned his employer; "that notorious counterfeit moneymaker I have just saved from going to prison tried to pay me in bad money."

FOOLING PAPA



"When Fred proposed to me I told him to go and ask papa."

"But you don't really care for him?"

"Of course not. But I do so love to play little jokes on papa."

Safe

The prisoner was not professionally represented. Before proceeding with the case, the judge said: "Your offense is a serious one. If you are convicted, it means a long term in prison. If you cannot hire a counsel, the court will appoint one for you."

The prisoner leaned toward the judge and, in the most confidential manner, whispered: "I have no lawyer, your honor, but that's all right. My tailor and my landlady are on the jury."

Wrong Line

A business man who had an important telephone call to put through finally interrupted a feminine conversation which seemed liable to continue indefinitely.

"Say," snapped one of the women, "what line do you think you're on, any way?"

"Well," replied the business man, "I've come to the conclusion that I must be on the clothesline."—Atlanta Journal.

Her Daily Good Turn

Jean had been naughty and had been sent into the den to "think things over." After a while she came out all smiles and said: "I thought and I prayed."

"Fine!" said her mother. "That will help you to be good."

"Oh, I didn't ask God to help me to be good," said the child. "I just told him to help you put up with me."—Parents' Magazine.

Authorities on economics state the business cycle occurs in distinct periods—first, the crisis, the turning point which marks the collapse of the period of prosperity, usually initiated by a buyers' strike as a reaction from high prices; second, emergency liquidation; third, depression; fourth, readjustment; fifth, recuperation; sixth, prosperity, and seventh, overextension and speculation.

Father Loved Punishment

By FANNIE HURST

(© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.) (WNU Service)

TO KATHLEEN, ever since she could remember, there had been something almost unbearably pathetic about her father. Not alone because he was so good; not alone because widowered at thirty, his middle years had been entirely dominated by the heritage of a brood of five young children; not alone because with hands horny from labor, nightly he would undress with the tenderness that would have befitted the wife who had left him in death, the five noisy, brawling, often squalling youngsters, who rode him with a high hand because of his apparently infallible good humor.

To Kathleen, his second, his pathos lay rather in the fact that he accepted it all without question or rebellion. There were five children to be reared on his meager earnings as gardener in one of the town's public parks; five mouths to be fed; five small minds to be trained; five pairs of feet to be shod and that was all there was to it. No grumblings. No complaints. No stinting in so far as it was possible for him to provide.

He was just the best old thing! Time and time again, Kathleen's conclusions regarding him summed themselves up in that rather defeated conclusion. He's just the best old thing.

Completely unaffected in the way that Kathleen was affected were the remaining four children of Pat. Emma, the eldest, had no particular attitude about her father. That is, in so far as she felt anything more than the warm filial affection due a parent from a dutiful daughter. The three boys, pretty rough, all of them, from the vagabonding childhood about the streets, took their "old man" somewhat for granted. "Pap's all right. Little bit of a dub, but Pap's all right. Gives me a pain in the neck sometimes, but Pap's all right."

Not one of the four would have known quite what Kathleen meant had she tried to explain the pathos that cut into her heart where her father was concerned. His patient way of plodding off to the park, grateful for coffee if Kathleen or Emma happened to be up to give it to him before he left; uncomplaining and silent if the kitchen stove were cold when he came down and starting off to work with a roll taken from the baker's bag of them at the kitchen door, as he made exit.

It was not often Kathleen let this happen, but the weeks she had been laid up with a broken ankle, time and time again Emma had lain oversleeping and father had gone off without breakfast.

He had a way with the boys, too, of letting them bully him. He was forever contributing out of his weekly wage to tide them over this and that dilemma. "Pap, if you don't let me have a fiver this week, I might as well throw up my job and it'll mean the devil to pay. I owe the till five and it's got to be paid."

That patient, tired, horny old hand sliding down into the worn pocket of his baggy trousers! That patient, walrus-shaped, sandy-colored old mustache, drooping with perplexity and disapproval. Not a particularly efficient father, as fathers go, weak with his boys, vacillating in what few demands he made and absurdly sentimental with his girls.

"My Katy's the queen of them all. My Emma is a lark of the morning."

This becaus Emma, with a pretty fluty voice wh l been trained from lessons sqeezeu, dear knows how, out of father's lean weekly envelope, had created about herself, in the narrow little household, somewhat of the aura of a prodigy.

Emma sang. Emma's voice was something to be treated like a jewel in its casket. That was why it was sometimes necessary for father to go off to work without breakfast. A body that contained a voice must not be overtried or overtired.

Father fell in with that. But Kathleen, who was on night shift as telephone operator and did not always return home in time to fix father his breakfast, would boil and then sob a little, inwardly, at the patience of father. The dear, tired, gallant patience of father.

For eighteen years of widowerhood, father stood for all this, sweetly, a little tiredly, but so uncomplainingly that sometimes it seemed to Kathleen he must be made of the stuff of saints. Then, one by one, the boys married and took themselves and their bickerings and their demands and their uncouthness and their inconsiderate bullyings out of the house; and next came Emma, who inside of twenty-four hours met, fell in love with, married and went off with the orchestra leader of a traveling musical show which had come to town.

By this time, resolutely, there began to take full shape in Kathleen's mind a half-formed dream which had lodged there ever since she had been old enough to cerebrate about the stunted life of her father. He was fifty-nine by now, rheumatic, subject to spells of asthma and bent from the long years at gardening.

Father must have his day. Somehow, some way, now with the boys and Emma no longer hanging like so many sacs around his neck, he must be given the first respite he had known.

Safely hidden beneath Kathleen's mattress, were three one hundred-dollar bills and a fifty, the result of five years of saving toward this end. Given this start, and what with her capacity for earning at the telephone exchange where she was now chief operator, there was no reason in the world why father might not retire.

The scheme, amusingly presented, was to be his sixtieth birthday gift.

There was, to be sure, one serious rift within the lute. It meant a continuation of the indefinite postponement of Kathleen's own romance, one of long standing, with a young fellow exactly her own age, proficient in the lovely work of bookbinding. Not a highly paid success job, as those things go, but a quiet, beautiful vocation that in Kathleen's eyes was part of the very bone and fiber of the youth himself.

It was hard, the waiting. There had been six years of it already. But there had always been valid reason, and now, with the father approaching sixty, more valid the reason than ever.

With more of staid reconciliation to circumstance than their years would presuppose, the youngsters bowed once more to the dictates of the situation and Kathleen began the dedication of her time, her funds, and herself to her father's twilight years.

It would all have gone through very well, the surprise she had planned for him on his birthday when the new scheme for his retirement from gardening, his leisure and his new life in a home freed of responsibility were to be sprung on him, except for one circumstance.

On the eve of his birthday, father married the widow Croop, a comely neighbor woman of forty-three, with seven growing children and, as she shyly confessed to Kathleen the incredible evening that the incredible pair came trooping home, "the hope of more."

Father, seeming thus to love his punishment, Kathleen and the young bookbinder are married now, and even as father and the widow Croop, are living happily ever after.

Civilization Has Laid Hand on Desert Trail

I remember chromos of the desert trail, with hollow-eyed skulls of longhorns beside the wagon tracks. And now I have seen that trail, graded and ditched, with signs marked "soft shoulders" and "speed limit: forty-five miles." There are skeletons beside the road now, too—the rusting, crumpled, wheelless skeletons of old Fords, upside down.

On that blue mountain, blue from here, but white sand and pale olive brush when you get to it, the miners used to make little holes and tunnels in hope of precious metal. Now there in a great white "A" on its crest, visible for miles around. A tribute to alma mater from the students of the University of Arizona.

The new tenants of the land of adventure and straight shooting. The scientific grapefruit grower. The director of the desert laboratory. The professor of romance languages. The manager of the hotel with white-tiled bathrooms, who is a member of the Hotel Greeters' association. The lady in a smock who sells Indian art goods. The owner of twenty-two chain grocery stores throughout the state. The income tax expert. The golf professional. The A. P. correspondent. The wild young pitcher, who hopes that a scout from Los Angeles is looking at his curves and not at the beautiful deranged sun setting over the mad blue mountains.—Robert Littell in the American Mercury.

Famous Ocean Races

One of the famous California clipper races was that of the Wild Pigeon, John Gilpin, Flying Fish and Trade Wind. They sailed against time, leaving New York on different dates. Flying Fish won, making the passage from New York to San Francisco in 92 days 4 hours, from port to anchor. The Gilpin made it in 93 days from port to pilot, and Wild Pigeon in 118 days. The Trade Wind, which left some time after the others, followed with 102 days, having taken fire and burned for 8 hours on the way. Another famous race was that between William H. Webb's Swordfish and Donald McKay's Flying Fish. The latter sailed from Boston November 5, 1851, and on the same day the Swordfish passed Sandy Hook. The Swordfish arrived in San Francisco on February 10, 1852, after a passage of 90 days from Boston.

Chemicals Combat Ice

Several states where there is considerable snow or ice on the highways have adopted the use of chemicals in conjunction with the sand or cinders used heretofore to prevent skidding. Calcium chloride mixed with the sand or ashes causes it to imbed itself in the ice and prevents it from blowing away or being swept aside by passing cars.

Day of Rest

Joe was putting up his usual argument against going to bed at the usual time, and the day being Sunday it took this somewhat new form.

"Oh, no, mamma, I don't need to go to bed yet, 'cause I slept late this morning, and I slept all through church."

Little Used Language

A book was recently printed in a language that is spoken by only 300 people. It is a version of the Gospels prepared by the British and Foreign Bible society for the use of the Worrora, a tiny tribe of Australian aborigines.

Sights of London That Linger in the Memory

Perhaps there is no city in the world about which more books have been written than London. There are a thousand Londons—those found in Limehouse, Rotton row, Bloomsbury, Cheapside, Petticoat lane, the Strand, West end, Leicester square, Whitechapel—one could go on endlessly just writing the names of the streets and neighborhoods in London that have been made famous by an army of poets and novelists.

But merely because London is so vast, endless and varied, only the outstanding sights of that fascinating city can be described in these short articles.

There are, for instance, the Whitehall Horse Guards. The ceremony of mounting the guard, which takes place every morning in front of this historic old place, never fails to attract a crowd. The moment the new mounted soldiers in their brightly colored uniforms relieve their fellows and get into position they are like men of stone, and their horses seem to be also of stone—neither ever seems to move to the slightest degree.

Only specially privileged persons are permitted to drive through the gateway and arch. Beyond there lies the Horse Guards' parade, where every year, on the king's birthday, the magnificent military spectacle, "Trooping the Colors," is performed before his majesty.

And yet, as interesting as are Whitehall and the other famous sights such as the National gallery with its scores of masterpieces of art, the unmatchable British museum, Big Ben, the houses of parliament and Buckingham palace, none of them are the London you remember after you have left her vast midst.

Temptation and conscience often have a debate; and temptation outtalks conscience.

A Protective Food

The importance of cod liver oil of high vitamin test was recently stressed in a Government pamphlet, Emergency Food Relief and Child Health. "An indispensable food for young children," it characterized this valuable oil, rich in Vitamins A and D. Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil is a pleasing, palatable way of taking this great "protective food." In it, children gain a store of resistance-building and bone-developing vitamins. Lesson for Mankind in Bees' Trick on Mr. Bear

This happened long, long ago even before the first Indians broke the trails along the Mohawk and the Genesee. In those times, Mr. Bear had a long, long nose and a reputation of putting it in everybody's business besides his own, according to this fable related by Dr. E. A. Bates of Cornell university.

One of his most evil deeds was stealing the bees' honey. This made the bees very angry and finally they held a big council about the matter. After due deliberation, they sent a courier bee to bring in their friend, the woodpecker. In a common council, the bees and the woodpecker devised a scheme to trap the wicked bear and stop him from stealing the honey.

They selected a tree trunk that was hollow from the top to the ground and the woodpecker cut a hole in its side, just the size of the bear's nose. The bees smeared honey all around the hole and then all secreted themselves within the hollow tree trunk.

Along came the wicked old Mr. Bear with his long nose sniffing in the air. At length, he smelled the honey and stuck his nose in the hole, whereupon the bees jumped on it and cut it right off short, as it is today The bees and the woodpecker learned the value of common council, which they taught the red man; and Indian children are told to keep their noses out of other folk's affairs by seeing what happened to old Mr. Bear's long nose many, many moons ago.

Because you know the real facts, is not always a reason why you should butt in and spoil the talk.

Two Chicago Bankers Prominent In Drive Against Depression

Charles G. Dawes (left), Chairman of the New Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and Melvin A. Traylor, Chicago Banker.

CHICAGO and the Middle West have a double interest in the success of the gigantic Reconstruction Finance Corporation which is now being organized in Washington following speedy action by Congress.

Charles G. Dawes, whose name is almost synonymous for the business community of Chicago will sit in the driver's seat as the active head of the great $2,000,000,000 Federal corporation just authorized by Congress.

Another Chicago banker, a Democrat who is being repeatedly mentioned as a man of Presidential timber, has the distinction of making a vital contribution to the initial strength and success of the Reconstruction Corporation. That man is Melvin A. Traylor, president of the First National Bank of Chicago, who was the first to visualize and propose that the Reconstruction Corporation render some service to thousands of depositors of small banks which had failed during the past two years. The gist of Mr. Traylor's proposal before a Senate Sub-Committee was that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation be authorized to make loans to closed banks as well as to financial institutions and others needing its aid. Such a step would release substantial amounts of money to depositors whose funds had been "frozen" by the failure of such banks.

Mr. Traylor's suggestion made such an impression that it was embodied in the Bill as finally passed by Congress. He, more than any other man, is responsible for the timely assistance that will now be possible for many depositors of small banks throughout the country.

AMERICA'S WORLD RESPONSIBILITIES

By H. J. HAAS
President American Bankers Association

H. J. HAAS

WE are in a changing world, with many new financial problems for which we have no precedents, and many old problems which have so changed as to be unrecognizable. American bankers have been called into world affairs to blaze new trails of unknown finance. We may expect these calls to be more numerous in the future than they have in the past. We are the world's financial leader and we must accept the responsibility which goes with it.

Let us look to the future with confidence. Every one has experienced a great sorrow some time, perhaps so great we felt we could never overcome it, but time is the great healer and eventually we have come out of it. As it is with individuals, so it is with nations. Our nation has had much sorrow in the 155 years of its existence. In that time we have passed through the major depressions of 1837-1857-1873 to 1879-1884-1893-1896-1907-1914-1921 and the present.

I venture to state that in each of these periods there were those who had doubts of the future just as we have them today, but what happened after each depression? Our country recovered, to be better and stronger than ever. Its people were introduced to modes of living they never dreamed of, until today, notwithstanding our depression, we live on the highest plane of any nation in the world. Should we not judge the future by past experience?

Surely our people are better prepared, financially and intellectually, to cope with even greater problems than they have been in the past, so why not look to the future confident that fundamental social and economic problems will be adjusted satisfactorily?

Confidence is not established by any one thing but by an accumulation of things. If we can get confidence started on its way, gathering a little here and there, it will accelerate its speed as it goes along. This is not the work of any one man to perform but is the cumulative effort of each and every one of us. What we are in the future is not the result of what we have done on any one day but the result of all that we have done for all time. The American Bankers Association is endeavoring to do its part. Individually our efforts may not count for much, but they are part of the whole plan and taken in the aggregate they amount to the sum total of all our efforts.

PUBLIC INJURED BY BANK GOSSIP

National Association Declares Community Interests Demand Protection Against Idle Rumors

BOTH in their advertising and in their direct contacts with customers and others, bankers should "consciously and persistently devote more time and thought to keeping people mindful of the fact that while the bank has many obligations toward its customers, equally is it true that the depositor also has certain obligations to the bank to enable it to properly maintain its position in the community," a recent statement of the American Bankers Association declares.

"A bank admittedly is a semi-public institution and there is a mutuality of obligation resting upon both the banker and his customers to maintain the effective functioning of that institution that is superior to the personal interests of either," it says.

Bankers might well consciously devote greater effort to building up the public viewpoint in their communities that due to their public obligations and burden of public interest, the banks are entitled to protection against ill-informed or malicious gossip and rumors, the statement says.

"As to banks in some states, bank slander laws afford this protection," it points out. "We recommend that this protection be availed of by definite action wherever practical both as a matter of immediate expediency an also to awaken public opinion as to the dangers of idle gossip about a community's banking institutions."

What Can Be Done

Farmers should rid themselves of any false hope of outside aid from legislation. The only recourse left for the producer on a reduced price level is to produce his goods at reduced costs, and nearly every farmer can likely put into force a few economies in production. Farmers must produce as largely as possible the materials they use, and get away from cash purchases until prices come down proportionately on the things they buy. The cheapest way in the farming business is to raise your own feed and not let the other man get your dollars.

Rosewood Man Gets Gold Nugget

Rosewood, Minn. — March 1. A gold nugget weighing one fourth of a pound has been received here by Harry Myrom, from his brother Albert Myrom who is engaged at the gold mining business 200 miles north from Healy Falls, Alaska. Myrom together with a companion has been prospecting for gold in northern Alaska for five years, and last year installed a hydraulic washing plant on a government leased mining claim, and has since sent gold bullion for more than $1000 to the U. S. Mint for coinage.

Many hardships are related in connection with the life of the two men, and cold and snow are at times almost unbearable. All supplies and food must be transported by dog teams from Healy Falls, and it is very seldom that the tedious journey can be risked with the more reliable pack horses.

Myrom visited northern Minnesota three years ago after he had done some prospecting in Alaska and was then very much enthusiastic about the outlook. His letters now are very encouraging and he believes the worst hardships are over and that they may look forward to rewards for all their hardships.

To Instal New Radio Equipment

An appeal was circulated this week by Rev. R.M. Fjelstad and H. L. Sjogren, reading in part as follows:

"The Oakland Park Sanitorium is doing an excellent work in caring for tubercular patients. There is, however, one small improvement that might be made in the equipment which would greatly enhance our services and make them more effective. A few years ago a set of earphones were installed for the benefit of the patients. These phones have now become useless because of faulty radio equipment. Our ministerium has investigated the matter and found that at an expense of approximately $400.00, a radio, equipped with microphone and powerful enough to carry a message to all the earphones, could be installed. Such equipment would not only enable us to reach every patient in the Sanitorium with a message from God, but would be an accomodation to the doctor in giving his instructions to his patients, and make possible the listening in on some of the excellent services and programs available by radio today.

"Shared by the many congregations within this territory, the cost on each would be small. We as a ministerium have therefore agreed to appeal to you to enlist the interest of your people in this cause. We have estimated that gifts from $3 to $10 on each congregation should be sufficient. Should some congregation feel that $3 is beyond their means, we shall, of course, be thankful for less. The main thing is that all take part.

"We would like very much to present this equipment to the institution as an Easter gift. We therefore kindly suggest that you bring this matter to the attention of your people.

"Checks may be made payable to Rev. H. L. Sjogren, Treas., 603 N. Horace Ave., Thief River Falls, Minn."

Quality Cream Pays

If a brand of butter does not suit a buyer's taste, he might turn to butter substitutes, and the whole dairy industry suffers as a result.

You may say, "What can we do about this?" 95 per cent of producing fine butter is in the control of the man that milks the cows. Never in the history of the dairy business has the quality of your cream, that you sell to any creamery, counted so much as it does today, in regard to the price your creamery will get for their butter.

School Notes

HIGH SCHOOL

Junior:

On Monday morning the Algebra II class underwent a severe mental strain while writing their six weeks Algebra test. But the worst is yet to come. All the six weeks tests will be given this week, and the vital question sizzling on every brain is, "Will I pass?"

Everyone would rather sit and look out the window than study while we have such nice weather. Is that what you call spring fever?

Julius Faiman is librarian this week.

Freshman:

The English I class have finished The Merchant of Venice.

Report cards will be given out next week. Have we done better work this time?

6th, 7th & 8th GRADES

We had a Quick Thinking Contest in our room for a few minutes Friday afternoon.

Alice Bottem and Eleanor Peterson had the best papers in last week's seventh grade history test.

3rd, 4th & 5th GRADES

The third grade is studying Holland. They are going to make Holland on the sand table.

In History the fourth grade is studying the explorers.

The fourth grade gave the third and fifth grades a health program Friday afternoon.

1st & 2nd GRADES

The following second grade children had 100 in Spelling Friday: Morris Bottem, Lois Hanson, LeRoy Frederickson, Jerome Sorum, and Betty Louise Lorentson.

We summed up our work on the Stars and Moon and color combinations by giving a program to the children in Mr. Sather's room on Friday, and to the children in Miss Lanman's room on Monday.

This week the first grade is going to begin its study of Holland.

Harriet won the flag we made for being the most responsible child last week.

Mrs. C. Sannes and sons were callers at Mobergs Monday eve.

The Moberg young folks visited the Simmons family Thursday evening.

A farewell party was given to Mr. and Mrs. Mike Leiran and family on Friday evening. A very large crowd attended.

Here's wishing the Leirans good luck.

Raymond Sagstuen was a Sunday afternoon visitor at Mobergs. Did you enjoy yourself, Ray?

C. H. Doran visited over the week end with home folks.

Mr. and Mrs. L. Sagstuen and Gerald Moberg were callers in Thief River Falls Friday.

Old Highway Re-opened

The State Highway Department opened up the old highway from here to Thief River Falls on Saturday. The new road got too soft to travel on after the big thaw on Thursday and Friday. The new highway is not solid enough to hold the heavy traffic on account of not being used much after it was built last summer until it was graveled last fall when it froze up.

Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Peterson and daughter of Middle River visited at the Einar Loven home on Saturday evening.

Mr. and Mrs. Leo Florien and family were entertained at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Hans T. Larson on Sunday.

"Injuns"

THOSE who now-a-days seldom hear about or see a real Indian and, therefore, rather naturally take it for granted that our Indian population has dwindled to a mere handful probably will be somewhat astonished to learn that there still are more than 343,000 of them within our borders.

Beginning with Ababco and running through the alphabet past such better known names as Cherokee, Chinook, Choctaw, Crow, Flathead, Fox, Hopi, Iroquois, Kickapoo, Mohawk, Navaho, Osage, Pawnee, Pueblo, Seneca, Sioux, Tonkawa, Ute, Winnebago and Yuma down to Zuni, and including many lesser-known bands such as Cathlakaheckit, Chilliceekittequad, Kwethlmanish, Mishikhwutetmune, Paspikawati, Prinnshanwagotsito, Tuziyammos and Yaudanchi, a bulletin issued by the office of Indian affairs at Washington lists some 344 tribes still in existence.

Each of our forty-eight states and the District of Columbia has some citizens who are still classed as Indians. Oklahoma leads the list with about 110,000—approximately one-third of the total number. Other states which rank high are, Arizona with 43,327, California with 13,333, Minnesota with 13,326, Montana with 12,648, Washington with 10,920 and Wisconsin with 10,498. Vermont has but 24, West Virginia 7 and Delaware 2.

According to the bulletin, Uncle Sam conducts 184 well-attended Indian schools, while some 30,000 additional Indian scholars are enrolled in various state public schools. In addition, more than 5,000 are provided for in mission and private schools.

The Northwest School debate teams will meet the Morris and St. Paul teams on March 11 and 12 for the state championship among the Minnesota Schools of Agriculture. This year the Crookston negative will travel to St. Paul, while the affirmative team will clash with Morris in the Northwest School auditorium. The subject for debate is "Resolved: That the Several States Enact Legislation for Compulsory Unemployment Insurance."

Last year proved to be the most successful season for the Northwest School Aggies, when unanimous decisions were won over the St. Paul and the Morris schools.

Debate Coach Denis McGenty has held a number of elimination tryouts with the result that the original squad of thirty has been reduced to ten students from the three upper classes.

Sven Borsheim

Funeral services were held here last Thursday afternoon from the Nazareth church for Sven Borsheim, who died Feb. 21 at his home in Excell township, after an illness of several months duration. Rev. Redal officiated at the services.

Sven Borsheim was born in Ulvik Hardanger, Norway, Jan. 9, 1841. He was married in Norway to Anguna Undeland on April 16, 1867. In 1874 they immigrated to this country and located on a farm at Northwood, Iowa, where they lived until in 1903 when they moved to Holt. To this union was born nine children. Surviving relatives are nine children, Mrs. Anton Helge Lisbon, N. Dak., Mrs. Betsie Abrahamson, Gatzke, Minn., Mrs. Alfred Anderson, of Holt, Mrs. Ed Andrson, Mrs. Newell Bliton and Mrs. Herb Buchanen of Northwood, Iowa, Mrs. J. E. Johnson, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and Iver and Nettie Borsheim at home. Also 28 grandchildren. His wife preceded him in death in May 1925.

We wish to thank our friends and neighbors for the kindness shown us during the illness and death of our dear father and for the songs sang at the funeral.

When TEETHING
makes HIM FUSSY

One of the most important things you can do to make a teething baby comfortable is to see that little bowels do their work of carrying off waste matter promptly and regularly. For this nothing is better than Castoria, a pure vegetable preparation specially made for babies and children. Castoria acts so gently you can give it to young infants to relieve colic. Yet it is always effective, for older children, too. Remember, Castoria contains no harsh drugs, no narcotics—is absolutely harmless. When your baby is fretful with teething or a food upset, give a cleansing dose of Castoria. Be sure you get genuine Castoria with the name:

Pablocito cried out in surprise. "But he told me, Senor, that he was, and he—"

Lopez swore softly. "What trick is this, Senor; if the prisoner is not the Lieutenant Polito, who is he?"

"Ah, Loren, Loren, I would have saved thee!"

"But not thyself."

Lopez took off his cap. "What motive, Senorita, would you have thus to masquerade as your brother?"

"Ah, my captain," I laughed, "may one question the motive of a lady whose heart is full of dreams, one who has looked, perchance, upon the moon?"

The captain bowed to the Senorita. "My task is not so simple, neither are my duties to my liking; yet my orders—"

"Are to be obeyed," I said. "May I request, my captain, that you offer escort to the Senorita so she may return in safety to the home of Senora Ybarra? This will be my only request."

"Assuredly."

"No, Loren, no! I would not leave thee—"

"Ah, Dulce mia!"

"Yes, Loren, I am trying. Can you not see me smile? I am smiling—smiling bravely—as you would have me do. I want you to know that I am brave; you will remember me so—will you not, Loren—that I am b-brave?"

"Aye, my own."

"Then kiss me—and hold me to your heart again—and I will go. Adios, my—my moon-wraith. I—I have never believed that you are real . . . Just something fine and noble that was in my dreams."

CHAPTER XIV

Dawn

Ah, the melancholy silence of my prison, the horror of the dragging hours, the deep darkness, for the Senorita, having left, had taken with her all the light of the world . . . had taken my soul, my love, my life, and there was left to me only an empty husk. This I cast upon the rude couch and tried vainly to speed the measured minutes, courting sleep unavailingly.

I had given to the cause of Liberty and Venezuela all I had, had striven as desperately in her behalf as the most earnest patriot had striven, had been—so I believed—a potent force in the winning of freedom for her, and I had come to this. The dead hand of Colonel Pini could hold in check any one of my friends who might have offered assistance to me. Dead, he stood between me and liberty—which would have meant also love and happiness—and the shadow of his spirit dimmed my little world.

In my despair the face of Dulce came to me again. I heard in fancy the music of her voice, and my prison was filled with the glory of her presence, for at last I slept. And, sleeping, I saw the straight sturdy figure of my father with his fair hair and his clear resolute eyes; I saw the gracious lady who was my mother, and the slim, swaying figure of that exquisite little sister of mine, who, at fifteen, had given promise of great beauty. They would miss me, for they loved me, and they had given me very much indeed.

Three years had passed since I had seen them, three years that I had spent in Europe while the study of the rise and fall of races had held me, for it had been my desire to become a writer of history. I would write no history now, yet I had lived it. I had taken part in what would doubtless prove to be the last battle between my own people and their Anglo-Saxon brothers across the sea, and I had also taken part in that battle which had broken for ever the hold of Spain upon the western hemisphere. Aye, in a few short years I had lived a deal of history.

So, with the face of Dulce, smiling bravely, coming to me out of the gloom, and fading again, and the vivid pictures of my youth and my young manhood passing before me in swift panorama, I spent the night in fitful slumber; to awaken at last to the familiar tapping of Pablocito upon the door of my cell.

"You sleep, Senor," he said, "as one sleeps whose conscience is as clear—"

"Why not, my little Pablo?" I said, with forced gaiety. "Sleep has never been a problem to me."

"I cannot understand, Senor; I fear that my last night—and my last hour—might be filled with lamentations. Perhaps you would even care to eat—no?"

"Of course; should one miss a breakfast?"

"Ah Senor."

"Has the sun, Pablo—"

"It has just come up, Senor, and a sergeant and a file of soldiers await your pleasure."

"My pleasure, Pablocito; did the sergeant say my pleasure? My pleasure, then, shall tax his patience, for, first, I shall eat, then, with the aid of soap and water and a razor that you may bring, I shall make myself as presentable as possible. May one do less at such a time?"

"I do not know, Senor," he said in a daze; "is life so droll a thing that you should laugh it away?"

"Life is a glorious thing, my little Pablo, and I hope you shall have as much of it as you desire; I hope you may view this beautiful world until your eyes are dim with the years, that you may listen to the sweet sounds of nature and to the sweeter sounds of the voices of those who love you until your ears—"

"Gracias, Senor—I will hasten."

He brushed my clothes and polished my boots while I ate the breakfast of baked chiva and tortilla and coffee and papaya that he prepared; then I bathed, dressed, shaved, combed my hair and placed my cap upon my head with the greatest care.

"Then Kiss Me—and Hold Me to Your Heart Again, and I Will Go."

Ready at last I walked with him along the narrow darkened hallway and out into the bright sunlight to a wide iron gate that swung open at our approach, where a sergeant and a squad of a dozen soldiers took me in charge. I searched my pockets and poured into Pablocito's cupped hands all the silver that I found there and, with a word of thanks for his attentions, marched away beside the sergeant, with six soldiers flanking us right and left.

It was a beautiful morning, with air so clear that trees upon the crest of distant mountain ranges stood out with cameo distinctness. A breeze from the lake tempered what might have been a hot day.

"Do you usually take a morning constitutional before an execution?" I questioned the sergeant, after we had traversed a full third of the city.

"I am directed to bring you here," said he, as we turned into an arched gateway and bent our steps toward the massive mansion that has been the home of many governors. A guard at the great wooden door with its exquisite carving stood aside, and four abreast, we marched through it into a spacious chamber, which, at first, because of the brilliant sunlight that had filled our eyes, seemed a place of shadows. The sergeant voiced a sharp command, the soldiers about faced and went out, leaving me standing in the middle of the room.

In front of me stood the straight stalwart figure of a man with fair hair and the clear blue of northern skies in his eyes. A wild surge of joy went over me. I reached out my hands to him. "Father!" I cried. "Oh, my father!"

"Loren," he said gently, "you scamp!"

I felt his strong arms around me, I felt his muscular body shake with silent laughter, and hot tears of happiness blinded me, for I knew that I was saved, because my father never failed.

"When your letter came, Loren, we knew that you were again in search of trouble, for Venezuela—"

I laughed through my tears. "And found it; more of it, my father, than I have dreamed might come to one man . . . and happiness, too."

Now another figure appeared—the slim tiny figure of a man in brilliant uniform, with piercing black eyes, bushy brows, and a high forehead curiously seamed. Whereupon I fashioned a stiff salute, for this was South America's greatest. "I have erred grievously, my general."

He showed white teeth in a smile of welcome, then he put one arm across my shoulders. "And you have striven greatly, major; I think Venezuela shall not forget."

"You are kind, my general."

He spoke to my father: "This young giant has helped us win an empire. He is an omen of good fortune, for, since his arrival, success has come to us."

"I fear," said my father soberly, "he will never lay down the sword."

"A pity when he does," Bolivar said, "because he is a born soldier. With three hundred native troops he held firm against the entire right wing of the Spanish army."

"I am forgiven, then?" I asked.

Bolivar laughed. "When you permitted the Spanish lieutenant to escape you committed a crime against us."

"I knew it very well, my general."

"But almost within this hour," the Liberator continued, "the wise Francisco has brought to me the Senorita Lamartina, who seems to think you are a greater lover than a soldier. From her I have learned many things concerning Colonel Pini, who has paid sadly for his misdemeanors."

"Aye, my general."

"And your father, Garde, is not to be denied. He takes what he wants. He is the incarnation of that spirit of progress and determination that shall surely make your country great. No man may prevail against him, therefore you are free. But the ladies await you—and one may not keep a lady waiting."

Ladies? Then there was more than one. I wondered—yet I might have known that he would bring my mother. I faced her with mixed emotions of joy and contrition that my rashness had hurt her.

I got her in my arms, and held her close, and kissed her. Yet her lips were trembling, and her eyes were filled with tears.

"Ah, my sweet and wonderful mother, I have offended thee!"

She shook her head to free her eyes of the tears. "It is not that you have offended me, my son, for you have never done that; you have terrified me."

"Never again, my mother."

"You are half our world, Loren, and Felice is the other half. One could not be happy in half a world."

"Unless my country calls me, my mother, never again!"

"Then I am glad, Loren. There—there is Felice, my boy."

Felice indeed—yet I would hardly have known her. She had reached the fullness of the beauty that fifteen had promised. "My little sister," I cried, "how lovely you have grown to be! A woman already . . . Let me see—eighteen, is it not? It is a golden age!" I lifted her off the floor and held her against my heart. "My little sister!"

"You would see some one—no?"

"I would—and if I don't see her very soon I shall die."

"She is in your eyes, Loren; they are full of love for her."

"And my heart, and my soul as well."

She sighed. "If I find a man who shall love me like that—"

"Never fear," I said, "never fear; there will be too many."

Holding my arm she turned me around until the Senorita Lamartina—a vision in purple and lace—stood before me. "Dulce mia," I gasped, "ah, Senorita!"

I took her in my arms. "A heart full . . . and one's heart may hold a deal."

"May we go back to your beautiful land, Loren?"

"Aye."

"And will there not be some peaceful pursuit for thee?"

"Yes; I shall not take up the sword again."

"Now I am happy, dear . . . I have lost you so many times. You are not a dream, Loren, are you; this is not just something in my mind?"

"No, my angel."

There was a gentle tugging at my sleeve, and the voice of Felice came from a misty distance: "Awaken, you two. The whole crowd is watching you. Come over and talk to us. Yonder is the tall Francisco, who resembles a bird of prey and who fashions his conversation like a Chesterfield; there is Manuel, whose unlovely visage belies the golden heart within him, and yonder the gay and grizzled Captain Monahan."

"My sister, go and talk to them yourself . . . we have affairs of greater import."

[THE END.]

First White Woman in West Arrived in 1806

The first white woman in the West of whom there is any record, came out from the Orkney islands in 1806 in a Hudson's Bay company's ship, disguised as a young man. She came out to join her sweetheart. In the journal of Alexander Henry, it is recorded without mention of her name, that on December 29, 1807, she gave birth to a child at his trading post at the mouth of the Pembina river. Of the life of the child born that day, the first child born in the West of white parents, nothing is known but that his mother took him with her when she returned to Scotland the summer after his birth. Marie Lagimodiere, who became the grandmother of Louis Riel, was the second white woman to come to the West of whom there is any record. She arrived in 1807. It was 1812 before there were any other white women in the West. In that year, the second party of Selkirk settlers arrived at York Factory. They included 18 women.—Montreal Herald.

Wit and Humor

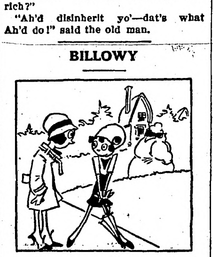
LUCKY FOR HIM

There lives an old negro truck farmer in Alabama who has frequent occasion to reprove his children for their lack of industry. "Yo' suttinly is a wuthless son," he declared one day to his oldest. "It's a dog-gone good thing fo' yo' I ain't rich."

"What yo' talkin' about, pap?" asked the youth. "What ye' do ef yo' was rich?"

"Ah'd disinherit yo'—dat's what Ah'd do!" said the old man.

BILLOWY



Mrs. Adams—"My, how stout Bessie is, and as smiling as a summer sea."

Mrs. Green—"Yes, and how billowy."

Frequent Occurrence

"As a witness I was required to promise that I would tell the whole truth!" said the indignant citizen as he was leaving the courthouse.

"Of course."

"And every time I started to tell it the lawyers on the other side proved that such a procedure would be entirely improper!"—Washington Star.

Old Stuff

Percy (beaming)—Oh, I have the most glorious news!

Esther (his cousin)—What is it?

Percy—Peggy has promised to be my wife!

Esther—So that's what you call news! A month ago she asked me to be her bridesmaid.

Not Plumbed

Alice was visiting her grandparents and proudly exhibited her new raincoat.

"Will it turn water?" asked grandfather.

"No," replied the puzzled little possessor, "I don't think there are any faucets on it."

Utility Plus

"What beautiful brown tiles you have in your bathroom!"

"Yes, they are nice. My wife made them."

"Your wife made them?"

"Yes, she makes fudge, you know, and sometimes it gets too hard to eat."

School Methods

"What's the matter?" asked Sophomorton of Coedna as they met on the campus.

"I'm conditioned. That young history professor says I'm poor on dates."

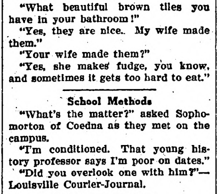
NOT FAST ENOUGH



Harry—"Did the horses you bet on go fast?" George—"Not as fast as my money did."

Good Proposition

"I want a book for this lad. No fiction, please; something that will help him reach good conclusions; and there must be no absurd pictures."

"Hm-m," mused the book-store clerk. "How about a nice geometry?"

Correct

Professor—What is the most common impediment in the speech of American people?

Freshman — Chewing gum.—Christian Advocate.

Tsk! Tsk!

Bobby (to guest)—Haven't you learned how to swim yet, mister?

Guest—Oh, yes. Why do you ask?

Bobby—Well, I just heard dad telling mother that you had a hard job keeping your head above water.

The Quiet Hours

He—If we were married, darling, the hours would roll by without our noticing them.

She—Do you mean we probably wouldn't be able to afford a clock?

"BY SWITCHING TO TARGET MY HUSBAND SAVES 50 CENTS A WEEK"

We had to cut down expenses, so my husband did his share by switching to Target and rolling his own cigarettes. I felt kind of sorry for him at first, but I notice he's more cheerful than ever.

"He tells me that Target rolls up into cigarettes that look and taste like ready-mades. Target is the same mixture of foreign and domestic tobaccos that the ready-mades use. You get 40 special gummed papers free. No wonder my husband tells me he's glad he changed. He's getting more cigarette pleasure than ever, and we're saving about enough to pay for the family's bread and butter each month."

HUSBANDS, PLEASE NOTE!

You pay less than one-sixth the government tax on ready-mades when you roll your own from TARGET. Buy a pack of TARGET. Roll yourself fifteen or twenty smokes. If you don't say they are the best cigarettes you have ever smoked, return the half empty package to your dealer's and you'll get your dime back.

STOP THAT COLD

DISTRESSING cold in chest or throat—that so often leads to something serious—generally responds to good old Musterole with the first application. Should be more effective if used once every hour for five hours. This famous blend of oil of mustard, camphor, menthol and other helpful ingredients brings relief naturally. Musterole gets action because it is a scientific "counter-irritant"—not just a salve—it penetrates and stimulates blood circulation, helps to draw out infection and pain. Used by millions for 20 years. Recommended by doctors and nurses. To Mothers—Musterole is also made in milder form for babies and small children. Ask for Children's Musterole.

YOUNG GIVEN NEW IDEA OF IDLENESS

Things have changed more than a bit. No one talks about easy money. The children, the young people, are hearing and seeing that idleness is a ghastly thing. They are afraid of idleness. Even they have learned that easy money isn't too reliable.

We thought that the days of great personal achievement in this country might be over. There wasn't much unexplored land left, nor many mines to discover. But as things stand now, there are enormous jobs to be done on the vitalizing and organization of finance and industry. It will take just as much energy and courage as can be brought to it.

The ideals of all these children are going to be better than they might have been if things had gone on at their swift, luxurious, self-indulgent pace. They are being brought up to realize that employment is a vital consideration of an entire country and to see how interlocked social groups are.—Margaret Culkin Banning in the Saturday Evening Post.

DARKEN GRAY HAIR NATURALLY

Easy to do this quick way

Don't dye hair. Science has discovered a quick, simple way to darken gray hair naturally—so nobody can tell—restore its original shade safely and as easily as brushing. It makes the hair healthy. Finest way known to get rid of gray hair, as thousands testify. Try it. Pay druggist only 75c for a bottle of WYETH'S SAGE & SULPHUR and follow easy directions. Results will delight you.

Willing Helper

GARFIELD TEA

A Natural Laxative Drink

Said Lydia to Roy

By FANNIE HURST

(© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.) (WNU Service)

THE sun lay blanching the hills to the splendor of perfect spring and as far as the eye could reach, from the little swelling of the land where Helen stood, slanting orchards, with young trees eager to bear, reached to the horizon. Presently, very presently, they would burst into incredible blossom and a world crammed already to its perfection with beauties of one sort or another, would accomplish the impossible, and become more beautiful.

At least, that was the way Helen, eighteen, and with the love of a youth in her heart, felt as she viewed it from the rear of her father's fruit farm, that was known as Farnham's.

With that kind of youth in her heart, and added to it love, and a one-hour-old betrothal, it was natural that to Helen, at eighteen, the quieter, more adult world which contained her father, Adam Farnham, and her mother, Cora, should seem, by comparison, lusterless.

You wondered, when you were eighteen and so in love with life that the ground under your feet seemed to quiver, when it was only you yourself quivering from love of it, just what there was left for forty and forty-five; Cora and Adam.

It mattered only to have been kissed, as she, Helen, had just been kissed by the youth named Blair Beck, who had just ridden over in his brand new car from his father's farm, not twenty miles distant, and with a ring in his pocket which now sparkled on her left hand. They were to be married and live in a white house with green shutters on the Beck farm, the promised gift of the senior Beck to his son, and the blessings of all four parents had descended on the youngsters as the apple blossoms would presently descend and whiten the scene for miles around.

The only deterrent, it seemed to Helen, was to have reached the peak of life so soon. From now on, what could there be but anticlimax to the ecstasy of this; the ecstasy of the betrothal kisses that still lay singing against her lips; the strange sweet tingling of the flesh; the dream of tomorrow that could not be quick enough in coming.

"You are young and too eager for life, my lamb," her mother told her, trying to calm her excitements. "Let everything come in its turn. There are compensations for every age."

How old the mother of Helen seemed to her when she said this, seated beside her lamp in her perpetually gray gown, with her gray hair drawn in low portieres over her ears, and her hands so tranquil at their tasks of mending or sewing frocks. How sapless. What was there left for Cora? Father, of course, but they had had everything together. Adam was as relaxed now as Cora was, and there were deep braces ground in perpendicular lines on the sides of his mouth, and they seldom kissed, he and Cora, and it was nothing for him to come in dog tired of an evening, kick out of his boots and just lounge with his head sometimes on Cora's lap, if she sat at the head of the sofa. And little to say. Scarcely ever any of the tender, lovely things to say, except if Cora happened to be ailing, and then he could be tender.

But who wanted tenderness only when one was ailing? Who wanted tenderness from a tired gray man in his stockinged feet; who, in turn, and the private question to herself shocked Helen, who wanted to bestow tenderness upon a pale old lady with hair of a gray pallor? Helen did, of course. Helen wanted to bestow tenderness upon both Cora and Adam, because of the passionate love she felt for them. The love of daughter for parents. But that was different. The question still remained high in her heart. How dared once face the down side of life, after the ecstasy of a present like hers? Cora and Adam must have had that youth, too, and now look. Oh, one must live, one must live in youth—to store up against the bankruptcy of age!

They were married, Helen and Blair, when the ground was white with the apple blossoms, and the day they returned from a four months' honeymoon the last slap of green and white paint was on the cottage on the Beck place and four aged, tired, amiable and retrospective parents were there to wish them endless blessings.

There were blessings. Health, children and a farm that widened and prospered. Blair succeeded well and the children of Helen were the fine, ripe children of health, and the sorrows that came were the inevitable ones of passing life and death.

With the years, the four parents sickened and died; there were frightening illnesses among the children, drought came and pestilence among the cattle, but in the main, the good overbalanced the ill. Drought passed, pestilence lifted, the children throve and the beauty that was Helen's ripened, bore its fruit, and oh, so gently declined.

The same with Blair. His heftiest years reached their peak, his broad shoulders carried their heaviest burdens, and slowly, almost imperceptibly, the years marched down. So imperceptibly that Helen, who had not felt her body wither, awoke one day to the shock of a realization that was almost more than she could bear.

Lydia, her lovely child, her little child, her little girl, only yesterday with plaits down her back, was betrothed. There was nothing one could say, because it was right that she should be. The youth was a fine upstanding one of her position and kind. They were cleanly, rightly, in love. They were of age. Helen and Blair, gazing with amazement upon this phenomenon which had befallen them, were the older generation, looking down the years at the love of their young ones. A rather quiet Helen, with gray in her hair and eyes that smiled more often than her lips; a quiet, undemonstrative Blair who came and went without much ado, and upon whom the years had climbed, whitening his hair and bending his back a little.

Remote, a little gray, a little lusterless, they seemed to Lydia and the boy, Roy, who came asking blessing. So old, so finished, as it were, so dear, too, but pale silhouettes against the pale, unexciting, uninteresting background of age. Across this chasm, the youth of Lydia and Roy looked at Helen and Blair and back across this chasm Blair and Helen found themselves looking at their daughter.

"Blair, were we at their age ever as callow, as adorably foolish and outside the meaning of life as Lydia and Roy seem? How can two such shallow little pans contain happiness? How can they know the rich, sweet things of life that we know? How long they must wait, dear! In a way it seems sad to be so young. . . ."

Across the chasm, Helen and Roy, staring at age, held one another tightly by the hands.

"How terrible it must be to be old," said Lydia to Roy, and Roy to Lydia.

Whole World Joined in Mad Desire for Change

In the reign of Charles I, when disturbance was brewing in England, Falkland imparted to parliament the maxim: "When it is not necessary to change, it is necessary not to change!"

He was for no violent change but for medication of public affairs without it. Would he were alive to set the fashion now when change runs loose in the world! Change for no good reason, merely for the sake of change. One's first morning coffee comes in a can with a new label, a new double lid. The old label was all right, nothing the matter with it; the top of the can fitted perfectly; nothing ailed it. The new label is a shock, the double lid an impediment. One's shaving soap has a new holder, new cover, or comes in a new size every year. The same with tooth powder; new cans, no better, just new.

Do not our good friends the merchants—does not everybody now—undervalue the familiar? For the familiar does have a value. One likes to get what he got before in the same kind of a wrapper, whether it is gospel truth or English marmalade. There is a rush to translate the Bible into contemporary vernacular. Little is gained by it. It just makes unfamiliar words and sounds of what was part of the mental texture of millions of people.—Life.

First Modern English Poet

Reuben Post Halleck says: "Before Chaucer's works English was, as we have seen, a language of dialects. He wrote in the Midland dialect, and aided in making that the language of England. Lounsbury says of Chaucer's influence: 'No really national language could exist until a literature had been created which would be admired and studied by all who could read and taken as a model by all who could write. It was only a man of genius who could lift up one of these dialects into a preeminence over the rest, or could ever give to the scattered forces existing in any of them the unity and vigor of life. This was the work that Chaucer did.' For this reason he deserves to be called our first modern English poet. At first sight, his works look far harder to read than they really are, because the spelling has changed so much since Chaucer's day."

Inventor of Post Cards

It was on the suggestion of an Austrian, Doctor Herrmann, that the post card was born. He had advocated the introduction of cards about the size of an envelope, to be carried at a reduced rate, the sender to be limited to a maximum of 20 words, including signature and address. This was in 1869. The idea was quickly adopted by the Austrian post office, and other postal authorities followed suit, including Great Britain, where the post card was introduced in October, 1870. But, unknown to Doctor Herrmann, the post card was suggested, years before 1869, by Henrich von Stephan, the founder of the Universal Postal union. It was turned down, but Von Stephan was the man who thought of it first.

All-Time Holiday Time

Some employers of France are trying the experiment of spreading vacation time over the entire year. It has been suggested by some employees, who would rather have their vacation when the weather was not so hot as to prevent the full enjoyment of the time. There is much to be said for and against this scheme, but some employers argue that it is much more convenient to have a few away at one time rather than several, as has been the case heretofore. Others claim that there is not much business in the heated term, and therefore the assistants can be spared best at that time.

NO FALLING OFF OF INFANT GENIUS

Gifted Children Develop Into Gifted Adults.

From time to time we hear of remarkable children who, at an almost unbelievably early age, show extraordinary mental powers. Some can read when average babies barely learn to talk; others perform abstruse calculations with ease; others become as fluent in foreign languages as in their own. What happens to these infant geniuses? Do they last or does their early promise lead to little or nothing in later life?

Until recently, says an article in London Tit-Bits, little was known definitely. There were isolated instances of certain great men who had been phenomenally gifted as children, but no one had ever studied the whole subject scientifically.

Some years ago there appeared a volume describing a thousand exceptionally gifted children who had been selected for observation by a professor of the University of California. The children have been kept under observation, and we have now the records of their activities at school and at the university. In nearly every case the gifted infant has turned out to be an unusually brilliant boy or girl.

"Verda" first came under observation as a tiny girl of two years and nine months. She was then in a hospital recovering from a double mastoid operation, one of the most serious that a child can have. This tiny tot then wrote a long poem on her reactions to the effects of the operation. A really wonderful poem was composed by her at the age of five.

At eleven, tests showed that she was in the front rank of the thousand children observed, and in another test at sixteen she scored the highest number of marks ever made by a woman. At seventeen she went to the university, and her career there has been one of unbroken success.

Of the thousand children observed, it has been found that the proportion obtaining high distinction at the university is more than double that of ordinary children. It is found, though, that in most cases intelligence does not increase quite regularly from year to year. There may be periods when it remains stationary or even shows a slight falling off. But always after one of these periods there is an advance. One remarkable fact is that children with brilliant brains seem to sleep more than others, at any rate up to the age of about seventeen.

Professor Terman hopes to go on with his tests and to publish later particulars of the careers of these youngsters after ten or fifteen years. If he does so he will answer one of the most pressing of all questions, there are many now who believe that youthful genius often burns itself out between the ages of twenty and twenty-five.

In our own country there has recently been a wonderful case of twins who have been above the normal since infancy. Other remarkable twins of recent times are the Misses Elizabeth and Jessie Jamieson, who had careers of exactly equal brilliance at Edinburgh university, and Drs. Arthur and Sidney Smith, the Harley street radium expert who, two years ago, ended their lives together.

World's Motor Cycles

Germany now has the largest number of motor cycles in use, 721,237 being registered. This was a gain of 112,895 in a single year. Formerly Great Britain led the world and was known as the "home of the motor cycle," but the comparative number for Great Britain now is 698,878. Ninety per cent of the machines are made in Germany. Some American cycle are imported.

The brain reaches its full size and weight at about the same time the rest of the body matures; that is, between the ages of twenty-two and twenty-five years.

Fifty and Fit

At fifty, you can be in your prime.

Why go along with "fairly good health" when you might be enjoying vigor you haven't felt for years?

There's a simple little thing anyone can do to keep the vital organs stimulated, and feel fit all the time. People don't realize how sluggish they've grown until they've tried it. The stimulant that will stir your system to new life is Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin. It will make a most amazing difference in many ways.

This famous doctor's prescription is a delicious syrup made with fresh herbs, active senna, and pure pepsin. It starts its good work with the first spoonful. That's all you need to drive away the dullness and headache of a bilious spell, and rid the system of that slow poison that saps your strength. It's better than a tonic for tired bowels, and unlike habit-forming laxatives you can take it freely or give it to any child. And it isn't expensive.

Get some syrup pepsin today, and take a little tonight. Don't wait until you're sick to give your system this wonderful help. You can avoid those spells of biliousness or constipation. A spoonful every now and then is better than constant worry about the condition of your bowels, or fear of auto-intoxication as you grow older. Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin protects the system. All druggists keep this preparation.

Pithy Quotations from Public Addresses of

MELVIN A. TRAYLOR

President, First National Bank, Chicago

"It is time some leadership and some party called our attention to the fact there is no magic cure for the ills and the evils of human folly. We trod the primrose path of extravagance, of thoughtless and of almost criminal neglect of every sound principle of human conduct, from the individual to the government, and the individual was aided, encouraged, and abetted on that path by the government and those responsible for its administration."

* * *

"One of the biggest things was a watered state of mind in which we all thought we were richer than we were, and were living beyond our means."

* * *

"In my opinion, no great division of human society has ever been lied to, and lied about, as much in the same period of time as has the American farmer."

* * *

"This then is my hope for our future—that we may be rich without forgetting to be righteous; that we may be powerful without being offensively proud; that we may be nationally minded without being narrow-minded; and, finally, that we may live in a world of fact without surrendering our faith."

* * *

"I would urge consideration of the complete abolishment of so-called floor trading, which, as I am informed, has about it most of the characteristics of plain crap shooting, and few, if any, more redeeming features than that delightful Ethiopian pastime."

* * *

"It is bad enough when the intelligent and wealthy speculate and lose, but when scrubwomen, day laborers, small home owners, wives and youths speculate and lose, simply because they can go to a broker's office and get credit for small sums, the practice ceases to be defensible on any ground."

* * *

"Out of the stress and difficulty of the situation I believe gradually we shall return to simpler thinking and simpler living. For it seems to me that we want above everything to abandon the struggle to live up with the Joneses, and to rediscover the true purpose of life, which is the joy to be found in the simple virtues of industry, thrift and sane living. I believe in our people, in our country, and in the God who directs our destinies; and I welcome the future with confidence and unshaken faith."

* * *

"We have not failed because of ignorance of economic theories, but because of our utter disregard and defiance of all economic laws. Ambition, stupidity, and greed have dictated policies, and trouble has been the result."

* * *

"All through history . . . the nations that have been agriculturists and have included in their agricultural and domestic pursuits the breeding and raising of livestock have been the nations that have endured the longest and performed the greatest work for mankind."

* * *

"Open the door of an agricultural school and you close the door of a poorhouse."

* * *

* * *

"Human welfare, I believe, means more than the mere assurance to the individual of political rights — life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness — as enunciated in the Declaration of Independence; it means also the opportunity to exercise these inalienable rights."

* * *

* * *

* * *

"What does freckle-faced Johnny, snub-nosed Bill or red-headed Jim care about composition, translation or conjugation? The only cube root life will ever give them a chance to extract will probably be that of a hickory or sassafras sprout; the only unknown quantity they will ever seek to find will be the measure of the nubbins they can produce on the worn-out fields their fathers have robbed before them; the only conjugation they will ever undertake will sound something like 'We Work,' 'You Work,' 'They Work'."

* * *

"We cannot trade the hungry, the unfed, the feeble voice of the sick, the empty basket of the unemployed, against the maintenance of party preference or individual advantage or personal achievement."

We got rid of the most of the snow here last week when the big spring thaw broke loose and heaped warm sunshine upon us for three days. The sleigh roads are gone and unless we get more snow, those whom have wood and hay left to haul, will now be forced to use wagons. We hope it will be nice from now on as it seems that things go better when spring comes around.

HOLT WEEKLY NEWS

Issued Weekly From The Home Of The Biggest Co-operative Creamery In Marshall County

One Dollar Fifty Per Year In Advance

H. O. Hanson, Publisher. Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota; Friday, March 11, 1932. Volume 21; Number 46.

Math Barzen Company Becomes Co-operative

A new farm-owned, farmer-controlled co-operative grain and seed handling organization was recently completed at Thief River Falls, Minnesota. This new co-operative has taken over all of the properties of the old Math Barzen Company Inc., which includes country elevators at ten different points, also the mill property at Thief River Falls which has been turned into a work-house and at the present time is one of the best equipped houses for handling seeds in the Northwest.

The new co-operative was organized under the co-operative laws of the State of Minnesota and every stockholder must be a producer of grain or seed. Stock will be sold to the producers tributary to these different elevator properties. The new co-operative is a stockholder in the Northwest Grain Association, a regional organized under the direction of the Federal Farm Board. This Association, in turn, is a stockholder in the Farmers National Grain Corporation.

Farmers National Grain Corporation is the national marketing organization for grain, set up by the grain producers of this country and has offices in all the principal grain centers of the United States, as well as connections in all importing foreign countries. This means that the producers in this district will have their own co-operative organization to handle seed and grain clear through to the ultimate consumer and instead of their sales being more or less localized, their grain and seed will go to all parts of the United States and foreign countries. Better prices will be received under these circumstances and these, with all profits of the new co-operative, will revert back to the producers who patronize it.

This is of timely interest to the growers in this section, due to the face that this new co-operative covers the territory in which approximately one third of the entire Sweet Clover crop of the United States is produced. The Barzen line the past year handled approximately 25 per cent of the total crop in this area and with the additional equipment installed the past year, are in a position to more than double the past year's handle.

Minn. Leads in Game Refuges

Minnesota's commanding position among the states of the Union in the matter of game leadership is attributed to a large extent to the extensive scope of game refuge development. This vital angle of game preservation and restoration is recognized fully by W. T. Cox, Minnesota's Conservation Commissioner, who plan further expansion in this direction.

At the present time, Minnesota has 130 game refuges, with a total of 3,010,929 acres. These refuges are located in widely separated sections of the state and provide sanctuaries for big game in many instances and for both wild waterfowl and upland game birds.

Quality Cream Pays

If a brand of butter does not suit a buyer's taste, he might turn to butter substitutes, and the whole dairy industry suffers as a result.

You may say, "What can we do about this?" 95 per cent of producing fine butter is in the control of the man that milks the cows. Never in the history of the dairy business has the quality of your cream, that you sell to any creamery, counted so much as it does today, in regard to the price your creamery will get for their butter.

N. S. A. Won State Basketball Title

By defeating the Morris Agricultural School basketball team 38 to 14, the Northwest School annexed the State basketball championship for 1932. Previous encounters with the St. Paul and Grand Rapids Aggie teams resulted in clear-cut victories for the local squad.

This brings to a close the most successful athletic season in the history of the school. Last fall the Northwest School won undisputed title to the state football championship following a 37 to 0 victory over Grand Rapids and 33 to 0 over Morris. These teams were coached by R. J. Christgau, assisted by E. L. Ocock.

Members of the winning team include Donald Anerson, Perley; Clarence Larson, Stephen; Glenn Kramer, Fargo; Kenneth Avery, Hallock; Leo Maatala, Oklee; Alvin Gronner, Underwood; Arnold Wolden, Saum; Mervin Hagen, Underwood; Searle Nelson, Fergus Falls; Art Hendrickson, Fosston; Rudolph Berger, Greenbush, and Rodney Lindstrom of Lake Park.

Other school honors won during the year include the School of Agriculture Crops judging championship with teams from three states and Canada competing, and third place in the livestock judging contest.

The final inter-school contest of the school year will be held next week when teams from St. Paul, Morris and Crookston meet in the annual triangular debate. Last year the Northwest School won the debate championship with unanimous victories over both the outside schools.

They Used Up His Hay

According to a report received at our office from a party whom had a lot of hay put up out in Mud Lake last fall, things are not just the way they should be. This party says he had fourteen stacks of hay put up and, has not sold any or fed any of the hay but, nevertheless when he checked up on the matter he had only four or five of the smallest stacks left.

Wedding Party Held

Friends and relatives of Mr. and Mrs. Obert Vattendahl met at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Hjalmer Johnson on Saturday evening and gave the newlyweds a parcel reception. They were many beautiful and useful gifts.

The evening was spent playing games and dancing. At midnight a very delicious lunch was served to the visitors by Mr. and Mrs. Johnson.

About These Talkies---

The showman wishes to announce that the picture to be shown here next Thursday nite, is a brand new release and one of those kind of pictures that the crowd will enjoy. If you have not been to show lately, you better take next Thursday night off and come in and see this special show.

The talking pictures that have been show here lately have been as good as you would find in any city. They have been shifting around until they have found the kind of pictures that the people here like, and have now booked several new ones to be shown here in the future.

"Caught Plastered" shown here last Thursday made a house full of people laugh.

Notice of Ownership

Any one found to have or will hereafter take or haul away any hay cut and put up for me in stacks on the following lands season, 1931, without my consent or settlement will be held accountible to me for such act and dealt with according to law. Any hay in stacks in Lots One (1) and Two (2) and Lots Five (5) and Six (6) and Nine (9), Section 8, T. 155, R. 41, Mud Lake bottom. This hay was put up for me by Melvin Nohre.

Holt Is On Christmas Seal Sale Honor Roll

Holt is on the 1931 Christmas Seal honor roll, which includes all towns that made an increase in the recent campaign, according to the announcement made this week by the Minnesota Public Health Association.

E. O. Nybakken, superintendent of our school, directed the local seal sale.

"This year was a particularly difficult one", says a bulletin from the Minnesota Public Health Association, "and special credit is due those communities which passed last year's record. Effort probably unequaled in any previous Christmas Seal campaign was made by workers throughout the state, all of whom donated their time and energy. The local manager and committees, the newspaper, the churches, schools, out-of-doors advertisers, the motion picture houses, and the generous public all co-operated to make possible the continuance of the tuberculosis fight in these difficult times when work is so urgently needed."

EXPERT EXPLAINS FREAKISH WINTER

Caused by Solar Radiation and Lunar Pull, He Says.

Washington.—A theory for the freak weather a large part of the world has been experiencing has been advanced by Herbert J. Browne, celebrated long-distance weather forecaster, of Washington. While his explanation is looked upon by official United States weather bureau men as merely a theory, to many persons it sounds plausible.

Browne's system is built upon the observations of a scientific man of the highest rating—Dr. Charles Greeley Abbot, secretary of the Smithsonian institution and discoverer of variability in the sun's radiation.

Browne believes the sea reflects solar changes, gradually gaining and then gradually losing heat, with the gradual increase and diminution in the intensity of radiation from the big luminary, through the 11.20-year swing which Doctor Abbot has fixed as the length of the cycle.

With due allowance for a lag of about three years, to give time for ocean currents to effect a distribution of the waters throughout the seas, from the equatorial to the most northerly and southerly and back again, is the groundwork of Browne's theory.

He also takes into consideration the cyclical changes in the position of the moon, with what he presumes to be its accelerating drag upon the currents, as well as its tidal uplift.

Now the lunar cycle is of 18.6 years. Thus at a given point (say in the maritime area to the southeast of the Florida coast) the combination of influences of maximum solar radiation and the maximum lunar pull would be felt only once in 55.8 years.

And this, says Browne, is just the influence which, in that area, recently has been approximating its climax.

The result, he asserts, is the creation of barometric conditions which, moving inland to the northwestward, not only are giving much of the country its peculiar warm winter but also have been giving it increasingly peculiar weather for several years past.

The Gulf stream, under the same influence, has penetrated much farther than usual, past Spitzbergen into the Arctic, where the warmer water, remaining at the surface, because lighter, has squeezed out the colder water underneath, hastening its movement southward along the European coast and causing exceptional severity of the winter to the southeastward.

Moreover, the winter has been a severe one in northwestern North America—in Canada and even, to some extent, across the border—for Pacific conditions have been similar to those in the Atlantic. The severity of Pacific coast weather has been occasioned by the Japanese current pushing past the Aleutian peninsula and into the Arctic, forcing cold currents to spread to the Pacific coast.

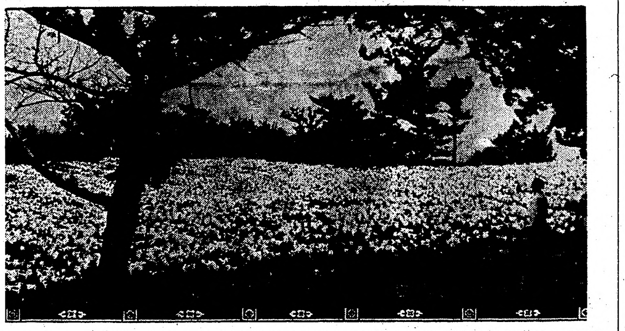
Bermuda Lilies Will Be Ready for Easter



Easter comes early this year—on March 27—and seemingly nature took notice of this fact, for spring came to Bermuda about three weeks ahead of the usual time. Consequently the lilies, a field of which is seen above, will be ready for the church festival.

Doctor Urges Music as Remedy for Sick

Chicago.—Music instead of pills for the ailing was suggested by Dr. A. S. Hershfield, former state alienist.

His suggested remedies included:

Grieg's songs to relieve nervous exhaustion.

Bach for an alcoholic hangover.

Chopin, Beethoven and Dvorak for grief.

"Tannhaeuser" for furious mania.

Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries" for melancholia.

The physician said music already had been used beneficially for many maladies.

Flying Boat to Carry 200 Passengers Planned

The Hague.—The world's largest flying boat, twice as big as the famous German DO-X, will be constructed this year by the Dutch aircraft builder, Fritz Koolhoven, at Rotterdam after a completely new model and at an estimated cost of $1,200,000.

The total passenger carrying capacity will be 200, with room still left for a freight load of two tons. The cruising speed is estimated at around 125 miles an hour. The power plant will consist of ten 1,000 horse power motors. It will be a monoplane with a wing spread of 325 feet. The maximum cruising range is gauged at 3,000 miles and the flight distance fully loaded 2,100 miles. The machine is intended for trans-Atlantic service. It is claimed that the cost of construction, while only half that of a dirigible, will produce a machine of a much higher efficiency.

On account of its size the ship will be built not in the usual aeronautical factory but in a shipyard.

Once High Officers of Czar Live in Poverty

Paris.—A little colony of Russian derelicts of war once all high officers in the czar's army, are making a last stand in a desolate retreat near Paris, still waiting for the day when the "white" revolt will come and open the way for them to go back home.

They are banded together by their wretchedness and despair, all cripples or nursing wounds, and despite hunger and privation they live within themselves the great days of the past when they commanded millions and were surrounded by splendor.

No more pathetic spectacle of hard times could be imagined than that which is found in the Maison Vera, once an imposing structure on the road to Versailles, but which, like its present occupants, is only a shell of its former dignity.

ROYAL APARTMENTS VISITED BY GHOSTS

Station Waiting Room Is Offered for Rent.

Windsor, England.—A mere $250 (par) a year will rent a suite of royal apartments here in the shadow of Windsor castle.

They are lofty rooms, emblazoned with heraldic devices and haunted by the memories of Wellington, the prince consort, and Queen Victoria, herself.

They are the former magnificent suite of waiting rooms at Windsor railway station specially built and allotted for the reception and comfort of royalty.

Royalty uses the rooms no more, for when the king and queen come to Windsor they usually travel by road. Since the death of Queen Victoria the rooms have been kept under lock and key. Now a "to let" notice is in the window.

In the wall of No. 8 platform of the station is an unobstrusive door. A rusty key grates in the lock and one crosses the threshold of the apartments which great courtiers of the past had entered to bow before a little woman in black.

Decayed splendor meets the eye everywhere. Long streamers of cobwebs festoon the elaborately plastered ceilings from which once had hung magnificent candelabra.

Dust lies thick on a magnificent Tudor fireplace in one of the inner rooms. Here, before a roaring log fire, Queen Victoria had warmed herself after enduring the discomforts of early railway travel 80 years ago. Here the gallant Disraeli had advanced to kiss her hand and whisper compliments.

Austrians Falling for 'Get Rich Quick' Plans

Vienna.—Out of work, or forced to scrape along on greatly reduced wages, Austrians have taken to playing the lotteries on an unprecedented scale. Statistics for 1931 just published by the government show an increase in every kind of "get-rich-quick" system throughout the country.

The Austrian government has a monopoly on lotteries. Besides the larger ones, several of which are for charity, there is the so-called "small lottery" for the poor people. Both together yielded the government a profit of $4,000,000 last year.

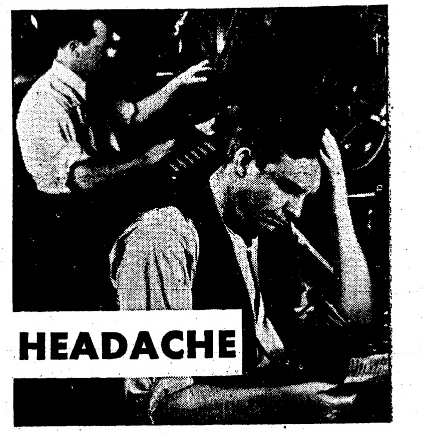
Besides the monopoly the state has an interest in the mutual-pari at the race tracks, collecting 4 per cent of the amounts bet. Despite the supposed bankrupt condition of Austria, the government takings on bettings at the trotting races alone was $2,600,000 last year.

Find Ancient Cistern in Justinian's Palace

Istanbul, Turkey.—The immense underground cistern serving Justinian's palace, which lay in the area of St. Sophia, has been discovered and is being opened to the public.

It extends from the foundations of the oldest church in Byzantium, St. Irene, which is now the military museum, to the foundations of St. Sophia, a distance of a 100 yards. It is still filled with perfectly limpid and pure water.

The vaulted roof is carried on a double row of marble columns bearing the seal of Constantine the Great. Between the capital of each column and the column itself is a thin leaf of lead to prevent the capitals slipping in case of earthquakes.



Nerves on edge. A head that throbs. You can't stop work, but you can stop the pain—in a hurry. Bayer Aspirin will do it every time. Take two or three tablets, a swallow of water, and you're soon comfortable. There's nothing half-way about the action of genuine aspirin. If the box says Bayer, you will get complete relief.

These tablets should be in every shop, office, and home. Ready to relieve any sudden ache or pain, from a grumbling tooth to lumbago. Don't suffer with that neuralgia, neuritis, rheumatism, etc; or lose any time because of colds or sore throat. Get some Bayer Aspirin and just follow those proven directions for instant relief.

Get the genuine tablets, stamped with the Bayer cross. They cost very little, especially if you buy them by the bottle. Any doctor will tell you they are harmless. They don't hurt the heart. They don't upset the stomach. So take them as often as you have the least need of their quick comfort. Take enough for complete results.

Made No Sort of "Hit" With Daddy

The return to the stage of our beloved Maude Adams brings to mind her equally famous contemporary, the late Richard Mansfield. Mansfield, like Miss Adams, managed to keep his stage life quite separate from his personal affairs, but once, on the occasion of Nat Goodwin's "steenth marriage," Mr. Mansfield said:

"Well, I'm not sure whether he's lucky or unlucky. As for me, I play mostly villains and was never a so-called matinee idol. Only one woman ever wrote me a mash note, and I promptly married her, lest she change her mind.

"I'll never forget the day I called at her house to interview her father on the subject.

"'What do you do for a living?' he wanted to know, and when I replied that I was an actor, he bellowed in righteous indignation:

"'So you're an actor! Well, get out of here before the foot lights!'"—Los Angeles Times.

Correction

"Do they ring two bells for school?" asked a man of his little niece.

"No, uncle," was the reply. "They ring one bell twice."

A city crowd is uniform which tends to make it interesting, but a country crowd—there's where you see individuality.

Safe Food Economy

ALTHOUGH you may save money on food, you must be certain to include the essential elements of diet. Vitamins A and D are necessary in your meals. These are found in Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil. "A" builds resistance, and helps old and young guard against winter colds. "D" aids in growth and the development of children's bones and teeth. In this emulsion these vitamins may be had in a form easy and pleasing for children and adults to take. Use daily during winter. Scott & Bowne, Bloomfield, N. J. Sales Representative, Harold F. Paris, about to leave Greece, has decided to take Helen with him. Making sure that Menelaus has gone to the links for the afternoon, he steals up to Helen's room.

"I love you," he cries. "Fly with me to Troy!"

"I wish I could," sighs Helen, "but I just know I'd never find a barber in Troy who could shingle my hair properly."

So Paris goes off to Atlantis and marries a mermaid whose hair is always kept in curl by the dampness, and the Trojan war is averted.—Kansas City Star.

Can-Opener Age

Says a passing item: "Not five families in a hundred in this country have even a part-time servant." In the good (?) old days before women's clubs and bridge clubs 99 out of every 100 families had an all-time servant in dear old mother. But not any more!—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Putting It to Use

Badlybent—What are you burning in the furnace?

Deadbroke—The garage.

It may be hard work to keep from being gray, but don't devote your entire time to it.

MUSCULAR—RHEUMATIC PAINS

DRAW them out with a "counter-irritant." Muscular lumbago, soreness and stiffness—generally respond to good old Musterole. Doctors call it a "counter-irritant" because its warming action penetrates and stimulates blood circulation and helps to draw out infection and pain. It gets action and is not just a salve. But do not stop with one application. Apply this soothing, cooling, healing ointment generously to the affected area once every hour for five hours. Used by millions for over 20 years. Recommended by many doctors and nurses. All druggists.

To Mothers—Musterole is also made in milder form for babies and small children. Ask for Children's Musterole.

Mercolized Wax Keeps Skin Young

Get an ounce and use as directed. Fine particles of aged skin peel off until all defects such as pimples, liver spots, tan and freckles disappear. Skin is then soft and velvety. Your face looks years younger. Mercolized Wax brings out the hidden beauty of your skin. To remove wrinkles use one ounce Powdered Saxolite dissolved in one-half pint witch hazel. At drug stores.

Brotherly Relationship

Halfbrothers have one parent in common. They are the children of two marriages of either mother or father. Stepbrothers have neither parent in common. If a widower with a son marries a widow who has a son, the boys are stepbrothers.

RESTFUL SLEEP for FRETFUL, FEVERISH CHILD

—With Castoria's regulation

When your child tosses and cries out in his sleep, it means he is not comfortable. Very often the trouble is that poisonous waste matter is not being carried off as it should be. Bowels need help—mild, gentle help—but effective. Just the kind Castoria gives. Castoria is a pure vegetable preparation made specially for children's ailments. It contains no harsh, harmful drugs, no narcotics. Don't let your child's rest—and your own—be interrupted. A prompt dose of Castoria will urge stubborn little bowels to act. Then relaxed comfort and restful sleep! Genuine Castoria always has the name:

A slender, dark, young man skipped nimbly out of the very luxurious French motor in which he had been carried from New York city to Southampton, Long Island, and preceded his luggage up the marble steps of that type of American palace called a summer cottage, into the vestibule.

This vestibule was constructed very simply, of mottled old ivory marble, with bronze urns holding Venetian glass lights, and bronze doors carved in the simplest possible Greek key design. The hall into which it opened might well have belonged to one of the simple old Italian merchants of the Fifteenth century—much of it had, in fact. For this cottage was the summer home of Aaron Glaenzer, jeweler extraordinary and gem-cutter plenipotentiary to the royal families of London, Paris and New York.

It was three full generations since Aaron Glaenzer's family had left Vienna, and he might perfectly well have been named James or Henry, if he had liked—but he hadn't liked. His wonderful brow, his deep-lidded eyes and his unmistakably modeled nose had not altered by a centimeter in those three generations, and he was very glad they hadn't, for he was very proud of them. This made him, like any other aristocrat, very easy to deal with, and everybody liked and admired him, among the rest his young guest, whom one of the cottage helpers introduced in a pronounced English accent as Mister Motherwell.

"This is very good of you, Motherwell," said the older man, shaking hands warmly. "We could have met in town, of course, but—I had my reasons for dragging you out here."

"It was a very pleasant drag, sir," the young man replied. "I'd be glad to walk out, just to see this room!"

The cottager smiled, the quick, flashing smile of his race, evidently pleased, as all of his sort are likely to be, with the appreciation of his little shelter against the elements.

After their meal, which was perfectly digestible and calculated to sustain them till morning, they went back to the library for their coffee.

When there was no one in the room but themselves, Mr. Glaenzer lit a pale and very fragrant cigar and moved to the fireplace where, since it was late October, a dull fire burned.

"And how is your young friend, Mr.— Mr.— that married old Miss Wintham's niece—was it Reid?" he asked.

"Yes, Douglas Reid. She was only her goddaughter, I believe, sir. They're as happy as possible. He's working like a horse. Going to have a baby very soon."

Again Mr. Glaenzer smiled his flashing smile.

"That's nice. Now, isn't that nice?" he said warmly. "How happy they'll be! I've collected about everything there is to collect, Motherwell, but there's nothing like the babies! If only they'd stay so—like the other things one collects!"

Motherwell thought of the only two of Mr. Glaenzer's sons he had ever met, and said nothing.

"Ah, yes," said his host, "ah yes. . . ."

They both smoked.

"Tell me, Motherwell," the older man asked abruptly, "do you consider yourself a member of the police force?"

"Certainly not, sir," came the quick answer.

"You have a regular business, then?"

"I have been a member of my grandfather's publishing firm for eight years. I am one of the managers of the New York branch."

"Ah, I see. But you have sufficient leisure to follow your various—er—hobbies?"

Motherwell's eyes twinkled.

"Quite," he said. "The arrangement was made with both my uncles. It's fully understood."

"Very interesting, very interesting," said Mr. Glaenzer, eying him thoughtfully.

"I used to know your Uncle Sears rather well. They tell me you have a real gift—a sort of flair, Mr. Motherwell, for putting your finger on things—for jumping at the right conclusion," he branched off abruptly.

"The Chief thinks I've done it once or twice," Motherwell answered simply. "But I'm bound to tell you, Mr. Glaenzer, that they have, mostly, suspected something, and asked me to follow it up. They had the case, really."

"Not in my case," said the jeweler.

"Oh!"

Motherwell waved his hand deprecatingly.

"That was different, sir. That was an accident."

"When a pair of queer people move into the house next but one to a great jeweler's and take great pains to get everybody out of both houses, and keep them under their eye; and even to remove an interesting party across the street; and when they spend most of their time in the cellar, knocking and hammering; and when their alleged business turns out to be an utter bluff—why, it doesn't take any vast amount of flair, as you put it—"

"Wait a moment," Glaenzer interrupted gently, "wait a moment. I quite agree with you. But the point is that everything was so cleverly managed and so apparently open and aboveboard, that the average and unsuspecting persons concerned were completely hoodwinked. In fact, your friend Mr. Reid appears to me to be distinctly above the average."

"But he suspected something all along, Mr. Glaenzer. He felt that they were fishy, from the start. That was why he told me about them."

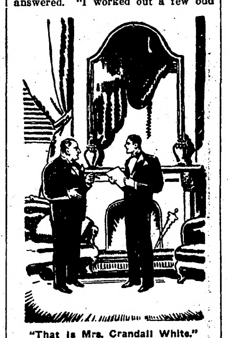
"Ah, yes," Glaenzer replied quickly, "but what did he suspect, my young friend? That's just the point. He suspected the wrong thing entirely. It was your quick action that saved us."

"I think you lay too much stress on it, sir."

"Well," said the jeweler slowly, "we shall see. That's what I want to find out. Have you ever done anything entirely by yourself, Mr. Motherwell?"

The young man's eyes lighted up. He could not restrain a slight flush.

"Not since I left college, sir," he answered. "I worked out a few odd things. But, of course, I never had any authority—"



"That is Mrs. Crandall White."

"You can have some, now," said Mr. Glaenzer, "and you are the only person I know, Motherwell, to whom I feel justified in appealing. I may be wrong, but you are the only person."

He moved over to the wonderful refectory table and took up a large photograph framed in Florentine leather.

"Do you know this lady?" he asked.

Very few women's faces could be said to add to a room as beautiful as Mr. Glaenzer's library, but this one did.

It was perfectly familiar to Motherwell, but he could not, to save his life, put a name to it.

"I know her, of course, Mr. Glaenzer," he said after a moment, "but I'm afraid you'll have to tell me who she is, sir. I've certainly seen her picture often enough."

"That is Mrs. Crandall White," said Mr. Glaenzer, and Motherwell nodded a quick assent.

"Of course," he said, "of course it is."

"By a curious chance," Mr. Glaenzer went on, "here is another photograph, just published today," and he lifted a magazine from the table, opened it and handed it to the young man.

The frontispiece was a reproduction in color of a famous portrait of the lady and you saw what no ordinary photographer could show you, the marvelous coloring of the original.

From the unusual yellowish pink of the flesh, up through the pale rose of the lips and the strange greenish hazel of the deep-lashed, wide-spaced eyes, the color rose to the extraordinary golden red of her unmatchable hair. It framed her face in profound, irregular waves, as different from the commonplace results of the process which embalms the memory of the great M. Marcel as from the God-given grace of the lucky curly head. It was planted in the famous seven points of beauty around her low forehead, and it folded back graciously, with a vague reminiscence of the classic, just showing the tips of her small ears—too red to be golden, but far too golden to be merely red.

Egyptian Stone Cutters

Despite prevailing impression's to the contrary, the ancient Egyptians discovered and used hardened steel in stone-cutting. Scientists, who have made extensive investigations of the Egyptian stone carvings, can refute what most writers on the subject say, that before 1,300 B. C. the Egyptians did not have iron or steel tools. To deny the use of steel for stone-cutting by the ancient Egyptians is, to a steel metallurgist, almost like denying the cutting itself, for hardened steel is the only substance known to man which could have served the purpose. Before the dawn of history the Egyptians made amazing progress, for they were able to produce beautifully carved statues of hard stone and such a pile as the 200-foot high stepped pyramid of Sakkara.

First Aid-Home Remedy Week

Chicago, Ill.—"Insure Yourself Against Needless Suffering!" is the intensive slogan of personal action which prefaces national announcement that the eleventh anniversary of First Aid-Home Remedy Week has been fixed for March 13-19. The National Association of Retail Druggists, sponsors of the plan which Sterling Products, Inc., dedicated to the drug world in 1922, is joined in this campaign for nation wide preparation to meet unexpected accident and sudden illness, by the National Wholesale Druggists' Association and the National Association of Retail Drug Clerks. For the first time all State Pharmaceutical Associations are also co-operating for greater preparedness for the physical emergencies of life. Several governors and mayors of municipalities have by proclamation called attention to the week which has enjoyed a decade of increasing success.

"Fill That Medicine Chest Now!" is the command that has been made from the first week to the present campaign, and all of them have been timed during housecleaning days. Secretary S. C. Henry of the N. A. R. D. in an awakening suggestion to the retail druggists predicts record-breaking co-operation this year when the week affords opportunity for live wire druggists everywhere to use timely advertising in their local newspapers and thus insure additional sales in a helpful effort to maintain volume.

Toilet Articles Found in Mesopotamia Tomb

An archeological expedition which is operating in Mesopotamia for the University of Pennsylvania, reports the opening of a tomb dating from 5000 B. C., in which it found a bronze mirror, a perfume bottle and a complete set of articles for applying face makeup.

These may appear to be trivial things to interest scholars. They reveal, nevertheless, a stage of society having the wealth and luxury which demanded such aids to beauty and the artisanship to manufacture them. The theory that the present stage of civilization is the product of an unbroken evolution has been badly shaken by the work of the archeologists in the last half century. They are penetrating a new field of antiquity, however, if they are uncovering a world of 7,000 years ago, in which people of the present day would not have felt out of place.—Buffalo Evening News.

Diplomatic

Three-year-old Marian and her mother were visiting in the home of Uncle Jim, dignified and unimaginative. Events proved somewhat disappointing to the little girl and she evidently decided to take matters into her own hands. As her uncle left home one morning, she said to him:

"Uncle Dim, if I was a big man like you and you was a little girl like me and you came to see me, I'd det you some candy."

She got the candy.

Unusual Request

One of the strangest requests ever made in a will is contained in that of Miss Rosalie Bicknell Babcock, aged seventy, of Lingfield, Surrey, England, who died last July, leaving £47,793. Miss Babcock directed her executors to have the oil painting of her late father burned before her funeral and that no one should be allowed to copy it.

Great Genius a Martyr

Animosity of War Softened by Time

A swords taken from an Uhlan officer, Baron von Lersner, in 1914, has been returned to that gentleman by Wing-Commander Marix, D. S. O., who received it. Wing-Commander Marix had landed at Ypres when he heard that a squadron of Uhlans were holding a chateau about two miles away, and that they had two British prisoners with them. He set out for the chateau with a force of marines. The Germans came out, fired some shots and fled. He chased two of them and the marines shot down the horses. Marix covered the officer with his revolver and the German surrendered and gave him his sword. He saw that the officer's horse was struggling in agony and was about to shoot it when he thought the German would like to do this himself. The Uhlan gave his word of honor that he would make no use of the revolver other than to shoot his horse, and he returned it immediately after. Marix then gave him back his sword. Arriving in Ypres Von Lersner once more surrendered his sword, and Wing-Commander Marix promised that if he came through the war alive he would endeavor to return it. Now after 17 years this promise has been redeemed when Marix heard that his old enemy was alive and working in a Berlin bank.—Montreal Family Herald.

Big Men Not Always Strong

W. Leonard Johnson, physical examiner for the New Jersey civil service commission, finds that size requirements for policemen are based on the belief that big men are strong. By tests on 450 applicants for police positions, he found that size bore no relation to strength in men over 5 feet 6 inches tall, says Popular Science Monthly.

Further tests revealed that up to 165 pounds, weight bore some relation to strength, but above that none. He said these facts showed that physical requirements for patrolmen needed revision.

Lost 20 Lbs. of Fat In Just 4 Weeks

Mrs. Mae West of St. Louis, Mo., writes: "I'm only 28 yrs. old and weighed 170 lbs. until taking one box of your Kruschen Salts just 4 weeks ago. I now weigh 150 lbs. I also have more energy and furthermore I've never had a hungry moment."

Fat folks should take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water in the morning before breakfast—it's the SAFE, harmless way to reduce as tons of thousands of men and women know.

For your health's sake ask for and get Kruschen at any drugstore—the cost for a bottle that lasts 4 weeks is but a trifle and if after the first bottle you are not joyfully satisfied with results—money back.

THE COMPLETE HOUSEHOLD SOAP

Summer Cleaning Time for Auto Seats

A vacuum cleaner readily removes the dust that settles in mohair automobile upholstery. Soap and water is best to remove ordinary stains.

MOHAIR IN AUTOS IS EASY TO CLEAN

Soap and Water or Vacuum Cleaner Will Usually Do the Job.

Extra work is distasteful at almost any time of the year, but especially in the hot summer when keeping cool and comfortable is essential, and the mind should not be bothered with troublesome added duties. As simple a matter as keeping the interior of the family automobile clean and bright may be a difficult and especially vexatious task in the summer unless one exercises special care and judgment.

If you use your car as you should, for vacation trips and other jaunts, to the beach, to the camp or to the golf course, dust and dirt are bound to settle on floor and seats while the ever-present risk of grease and other stains at service stations is increased by stopping frequently at unfamiliar places.

Worries such as these do not bother the motorist whose car is upholstered in mohair. Pure soap and water quickly remove practically all of the more common stains and without any damage whatsoever to the fabric, while a brisk brushing quickly removes dust. If a vacuum cleaner is handy, a much more thorough job of renovating can be done with mohair than with other materials, for the simple reason that the smooth fibers of mohair, the hair of the Angora goat, offer slight lodgement for dust particles.

These and other reasons explain why the mohair or velmo-upholstered automobile seat requires no slip cover, a further saving both of money and annoyance. Slip covers may be necessary for emergency use as when the car is sent to the shop for a thorough overhaul, but they are as superfluous on a mohair upholstered automobile seat as an apron would be over a woman's shopping dress.

Many persons have the mistaken idea that smooth, flat surfaced fabrics are cleaner than mohair velvet, which is a pile material with as many as 40,00 fibers to the square inch in the better grades like velmo. It is true that some other materials do look clean for the simple reason that dirt and dust that have fallen upon them have been swept up on the person's clothing. On mohair, however, dust settles to the base of the fibers where it is not removed by use but is quickly extracted by vacuum or by broom. An interesting test is to take your handkerchief and rub it once or twice over the surfaces of seats of different kinds of upholstery in cars that have been exposed to similar conditions. Your handkerchief will generally be much more soiled after being rubbed over flat materials than over mohair. That shows what happens to the dust that falls upon smooth materials—it clings to the clothing.

The cleanliness of mohair is of special service during the hot summer, but it is of even more importance when you wish to sell your car or apply it for trade-in. Because mohair velvet or velmo keeps its fresh, clean appearance even after long service, it frequently adds from $25 to $100 to the re-sale value of the automobile.

Harnessing Niagara

FOR untold ages "Wild waters leaping down a mountain side" produced the indescribably-beautiful spectacle now known as Niagara falls, but the tremendous energy (estimated to be 6,000,000 horse power) which was inherent in the tumbling of the Niagara river over this 164-feet-high precipice flowed away unused—wasted.

In an attempt to create power from this water a canal which diverted some water from above the fall to a point at the top of the gorge below the fall was dug in 1852. This water dropping upon water wheels turned machinery which ground flour.

The coming of electricity as power and the increased use of power spurred the imagination and ingenuity of master men toward improvement and expansion. Today, all waters which the federal water-power commission will permit to be diverted are used in a world-famous power-development plant which produces almost half-a-million horse power.

Water now diverted pours into a concrete-lined tunnel 32-feet in diameter and 4,300-feet long, cut through solid rock, rotates turbine generators and returns to the river. The electricity thus produced is sent by means of some 1,300 miles of transmission lines to users of light and power in 142 communities scattered through seventeen counties in New York state. The majority of homes in the nation probably reap an indirect benefit through the purchase and use of materials or commodities which are made available by this outstanding power project, while the development of this power by water creates an estimated conservation of $25,000,000 worth of coal annually.

The Time of the Stars

NAVAL observatory time is taken from the stars, usually two or three times a week, for the simple reason that this method affords the most accurate standard of time measurement known to modern time scientists.

In taking the time, observers use small telescopes. Stars which cross the meridian at a point directly overhead in Washington are selected for observation. The exact time at which each selected star will cross is definitely known through previous calculations made from astronomical records.

A micrometric mechanism produces breaks in an electrical current as the star being observed passes certain points in the field under observation. These interruptions are recorded by a chronograph on a sheet of paper. The same sheet of paper carries a record of standard clock ticks.

By certain measurements made on this sheet the exact time, according to the clock, at which the stars crossed the center of the field viewed by the observer through the telescope may be determined with surprising accuracy. It follows, therefore, that the difference between the time at which the stars are known to cross the meridian and the time at which the stars are thus found to cross the meridian, according to the clock, represents the period of time that the clock is in error.

As it has been found to be inadvisable, because of their extreme sensitiveness, to disturb the master clocks by resetting, the day to day error in their time is carefully computed and carried forward, the proper allowance being made when observatory time is transmitted.

Quality Cream Pays

If a brand of butter does not suit a buyer's taste, he might turn to butter substitutes, and the whole dairy industry suffers as a result.

You may say, "What can we do about this?" 95 per cent of producing fine butter is in the control of the man that milks the cows. Never in the history of the dairy business has the quality of your cream, that you sell to any creamery, counted so much as it does today, in regard to the price your creamery will get for their butter.

HIGH SCHOOL

There have been quite a few Sophomores absent this week. The Geometry class is now studying Trigonometry.

This is one time the Freshmen are ahead of the upper classmen because they don't have to wear anything in memory of St. Patrick.

6th, 7th & 8th GRADES

Lorraine Engebretson has done the best work in the sixth grade so far this six weeks.

Gertrude Nohre won the Quick Thinking Contest we had Friday.

We had a vocabulary test in eighth grade reading Tuesday. Gladys, Gertrude, and Thelma had learned the most new words.

3rd, 4th & 5th GRADES

We are having lessons in Art Class.

The following are on the Honor Roll:

Fifth Grade
- Opal Werner
- Adeloyd Larson
- Lorna Peterson

Fourth Grade
- Eleanor Haukeness
- Vernice Tollefsrud

Third Grade
- Sylvia Haukeness
- Francis Johnson

1st & 2nd GRADES

We are having a health race. Some of the children have been careless about following health rules so we decided to check up on some of their health habits. The children are divided into two groups. Junieve Larson and Romal Burtness are the captains. Each morning the captain checks up on his group for clean hands and fingernails, clean handkerchiefs, drinking coffee, and being in bed by at least nine o'clock. Today both sides were tie in the number of points.

The following second graders had 100 last Friday: Lois, Ruby H., LeRoy, Rubin Ness, Jerome and Russell.

Last week in Art Class we made an Easter border of lambs, rabbits, ducks and chicks.

This week we are making Easter cards.

In first grade we are planning on making a large windmill from a banana crate. We hope to finish it this week. Last week we worked on our sandtable. We have almost completed it.

UNKNOWN RELIGION IS PUZZLE TO SCIENTISTS

Excavations in Syria Yield Evidences of Strange Cult of Early Ages.

Paris.—Vestiges of an unknown religion which evidently combined the cult of the death with the idea of fecundity are being accumulated by the researches of the French mission in northern Syria, it was declared by Prof. F. A. Claude Schaeffer of the University of Strasbourg lecturing before the Societe Ernest Renan in Paris.

Professor Schaeffer described the excavations he has superintended for three seasons at Ras Shamra and Minet el Beida, where he has discovered royal tombs and the remains of a great religious center, dating perhaps from the Nineteenth century before the Christian era.

Find Strange Languages.

Further discoveries that are sure to be made in the course of the coming season Professor Schaeffer hopes will do much to clarify the significance of the finds made so far, among which are tablets containing inscriptions in several unidentified languages and comprising perhaps the earliest known efforts at poetry and literature.

"Our conclusions," said Professor Schaeffer, "must await further verifications, but we already know enough of the settlement that once existed there to be certain that it not only represented a great commercial center but also a religious organization and pilgrimage place of the very first importance.

"The precise nature of the religion we are uncovering each year. At the present moment it seems certain that it had for a basis the association of the cult of the dead and their burial in fertile earth as the source of eternal fecundity."

Professor Schaeffer described the large vaulted tombs at Minet el Beida, that was practiced and certainly expounded there we have yet to determine from the very rich remains that and the peculiar deposits of vases exhumed in extraordinary quantities in the area between the tombs. He told of the curious cisterns and tiled conduits installed in this area, which some of his auditors suggested might have been arranged for libations to the dead, to which the Greek custom of pouring libations might perhaps be traced. He then described the finding of frequent representations of the nude goddess Astarte, or the Venus of Syrian antiquity, which he believes have some direct bearing on the nature of the cult which will be revealed by the translations of the works transcribed on the tablets of the Ras Shamra library."

Gold Smuggled Out of Egypt by Camel Convoys

Cairo.—New drama in the form of gold smuggling by camel convoys has come to the Egyptian deserts and caused the camel corps to redouble its vigilance in its new task of helping to enforce the government's gold ban export.

A considerable quantity of the $74,000,000 gold in Egypt, mostly hoarded by the peasants, has been smuggled out of the country since the government abandoned the gold standard in September.

The burning sands of the Sinai desert have resounded to the crunch of camel convoys pursued by the camel corps. Large hauls have been made, but many big convoys have gotten through to Palestine and thence to Syria, where the gold is sold to French agents.

Most of the gold left in Egypt is in the possession of the peasants in the form of coins, ingots, and ornaments. Many have felt the lure of the high price for gold now being offered in Europe and have sold their belongings to speculators.

The Arabs in Transjordania and the Hedjaz, who were paid in gold by the British government in reward for their services during the World war, are known to be disposing of their hoardings.

Soft Shades of Color Found to Cure Lunacy

London.—The appointment of Paul Poiret, the dress designer and fashion expert, as color designer to the French lunacy authorities has caused a furore in Harley street, a grim foreboding row of early Victorian houses wherein dwell and practice most of Britain's distinguished medical specialists.

It has raised the oft-disputed point as to the effect of color on sufferers of the varying illness of Twentieth century civilization.

Sir Robert Armstrong-Jones, the famous lunacy expert, working in Great Britain, has placed sad and depressed mental patients in a red room with stimulating effect and restless and agitated patients in blue rooms with restful effect.

Another specialist whose reception office is decorated in soft pastel shades, with subdued pink lights and delicate paintings, said jokingly:

"I can only afford to have a room like this because I have private means. Half my patients are convalescent after half an hour's waiting in here."

Mexicans Once High in Politics Live in Exile

San Antonio, Texas.—Living in political exile and frugality, contrasting markedly with the fact that they were once commanders of divisions of the Mexican army and that two were once candidates for the Mexican presidency, five former Mexican generals are making their livings in San Antonio, Texas.

General Caesario pee's nuts for a living. Gen. Francisco Coss operates a small store. Gen. Antonio Villareal is seeking work. Gen. Pablo Gonzalez and Gen. Guadalupe Sanchez alone have means of any sort.

"I know they say I have a few millions, but the truth is that it hardly amounts to a few thousand," says Gonzalez, who owns property in San Antonio and in Laredo. He is the only survivor of the triumvate of generals who in 1914 placed Carranza in the president's palace. The other two, Obregon and Villa, died at the hands of assassins.

U. S. FOOD EXPORTS DROP OFF 167 MILLION IN 1931

Greatest Loss in Meats, Says Commerce Chief.

Washington.—Exports of foodstuffs from the United States dropped to a total value of $374,000,000 in 1931 C. H. Kardell of the Commerce department's foodstuff division, announced. The value of foodstuffs exports in 1930 was $541,000,000, a decline of $167,000,000 in a year. The 1931 figures, he said, was on an approximate level with pre-war foodstuff exports, but the decline does not represent loss in quantity so much as decrease in prices.

Trade in cereals and cereal products, meats and fats and oils showed the greatest loss, according to Mr. Kardell, while shipments of fresh, canned and dried fruits, fresh, salted, smoked and cured fish, and feeds and fodders increased considerably.

"The foreign market for fresh fruit," the report stated, "particularly apples, oranges, grapefruit, and lemons continued to show the expansion of past years and in this year of low prices the total value of all fresh fruits exported practically held its own amounting to $56,249,000, compared with $56,608,000 a year ago.

"The total value of grain and grain products exported in 1931 aggregated $106,046,000 and constituted approximately 28 per cent of the total value of all foodstuffs exported compared with 35 per cent in 1930 and 38 per cent in 1929. Wheat and wheat flour combined, comprise about four-fifths of the trade in cereals, with nearly as much wheat exported in 1931 as in 1930. Lower prices, however, resulted in a decline in value of 44.6 per cent. About one-fourth less flour was exported with a decline of 50 per cent in value compared with a year ago.

"Meat products comprised about one-tenth of the value of the food export trade, and show a greater decline compared with a year ago than any other class of foodstuffs. There were approximately 254,000,000 pounds of meats of all kinds exported in 1931, valued at $30,000,000, a decline of 127,000,000 pounds and $30,000,000 compared with 1930. The bulk of the decrease occurred in the bacon trade, which fell off from 94,846,000 pounds in 1930 to 38,428,000 pounds in 1931."

Survey of Kidnapings Reveals 279 Last Year

St. Louis, Mo.—A nation-wide survey of the extent of kidnapers' activities has revealed that 279 persons were kidnaped in 28 states in 1931.

The survey was made by Joseph Gerk, chief of police of St. Louis. He received data from 501 principal cities of the country.

Illinois reported the greatest number of kidnapings, with 49 for the year. Ohio was next, with 34. Then came California, with 28; Michigan, 26; Indiana, 20; New York, 17; Massachuetts, 16, and Missouri, 11.

Fire Rages Six Years in Coal Mine in Sweden

Stockholm, Sweden. — Investigation by a Swedish mining engineer disclosed that fire is still raging in the Sveagruvan coal mine, Spitzbergen, after six years.

The fire broke out in 1925, after the mine had yielded a large output of coal for fifteen years. The mine was finally closed when all efforts to put it out had failed.

Russian Custom of Seed Chewing Is Fading Out

Moscow.—An old Russian custom, famed in song and verse, has about died out—sunflower seed chewing.

No longer do the peasants' jaws champ rhythmically as they sit behind their plodding horses; no longer hawkers sell paper bags of the seeds on the streets.

The causes are twofold: Economic and political. First, there has been such a shortage of fats that all available sunflower seeds have been made into oil. Second, a strenuous campaign fought the habit, saying it was slothful and unclean, because its addicts sat about and littered the ground with shells instead of "building socialism."

Scientists Hunting Missouri Meteor

Rolla, Mo.—Missouri scientists are conducting an intensive search in southwest Missouri for a huge meteor, reported to have landed in this section with a loud detonation.

It was so large, observers said that it illuminated the sky and changed night into day as it passed over. It was believed to have come to earth near Vienna, Mo.

The meteor probably was 100 miles from the earth when it first appeared, said Dr. C. E. Bardsley, professor of astrology at the Missouri school of mines here. It probably was 20 miles high when it exploded, he believed.

Natives Impressed by Missionaries in Planes

Catholic missionaries in remote parts of the world are now making regular use of the airplane as a rapid and safe means of transport, it is learned. According to reports made to the Congregation for the Propaganda of the Faith, the use of airplanes is now common among bishops and priests in the missionary field, especially in Africa and Asia. Monsignor Grison, apostolic vicar of Stanleyville, Africa, used to employ 51 days to reach certain parts of his diocese. He has informed the Rome ecclesiastical authorities that he can now cover the distance in three days by plane. Similarly, in Siam, where the first commercial air line has just been opened, the missionaries now travel regularly by air. The moral effect on the natives of a missionary arriving by plane is stated to be excellent, according to missionary reports.

Black Locust Has Many Uses

Black locust is a four-purpose tree, says the United States forest service. It quickly produces good timber for posts and other uses; it roots strongly, thereby checking soil erosion; its flowers enable bees to make a good quality of honey; and it is a legume. The nodules on its roots store nitrogen in the soil, enriching it for future crops. In addition, it is a tree of beauty and is valuable for shade.

Diet Didn't Do This!

HAPPY little girl, just bursting with pep, and she has never tasted a "tonic!"

Every child's stomach, liver, and bowels need stimulating at times, but give children something you know all about.

Follow the advice of that famous family physician who gave the world Syrup Pepsin. Stimulate the body's vital organs. Dr. Caldwell's prescription of pure pepsin, active senna, and fresh herbs is a mild stimulant that keeps the system from getting sluggish.

If your youngsters don't do well at school, don't play as hard or eat as well as other children do, begin this evening with Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. This gentle stimulant will soon right things! The bowels will move with better regularity and thoroughness. There won't be so many sick spells or colds. You'll find it just as wonderful for adults, too, in larger spoonfuls!

Get some Syrup Pepsin; protect your household from those bilious days, frequent headaches, and that sluggish state of half-health that means the bowels need stimulating. Keep this preparation in the home to use instead of harsh cathartics that cause chronic constipation if taken too often. You can always get Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin at any drug store; they have it all ready in big bottles.

Where Men Are Scarce

A serious shortage of husbands is suggested by the publication of the voters' lists for the nine parliamentary divisions in the county of Cheshire, England. In each district the women voters outnumber the men, and the total excess of women over men in the county approaches 30,000.

SYNOPSIS

"Now, Mr. Motherwell," said the jeweler, "Mrs. White left her house day before yesterday at about eleven in the morning, and has not been seen since. Except that she went out on some perfectly ordinary errand, fully intending to return to her lunch, for which she had given orders, nobody knows anything about her since that hour. One message from her—or purporting to come from her—has been received by her husband, but it is not of a nature to allay his anxiety. Quite the contrary, in fact. It was received late at night, on the day she left—Wednesday. Here it is."

He handed the young man a sheet of smooth violet wrapping paper of the sort used in the higher-class shops that cater to rich women. On it was written in a heavy, soft pencil in very irregular lines, quite obviously blistered and rubbed with drops of some liquid:

"Dearest Cran:

"I must leave you for a little [the last word had been scratched out, replaced by "some time," replaced again by the original phrasing] and I cannot tell you why. But I cannot have you frightened to death—though I am. But you need not be. I will try to come back as soon as I can. Nobody is hurting me, Cran, you must not think so. I ought not to take even this time. You are not to send to the police or anything of that sort. I am going of my own accord. If you try to find out by the police, I swear that I will never come back. Remember that, I mean it. I will try to let you hear again. Pack up some clothes and send them somewhere—you will know what to say. I shan't need any. I am quite well. No one is hurting me. I told him that I tell you know I love you. I hope to come back.

"LELY."

CHAPTER II

Motherwell read this through very rapidly and did not read it again. Holding it in his hand he addressed a question.

"Lely?"

"Her name is Clelia," said Mr. Glaenzer.

"Is that her writing?"

"I should say so, beyond a doubt. Here is a note I had from her a few days ago." And he handed Motherwell a small, pale gray sheet.

"Dear Glen" [it read] "be sure to come in about four on Friday, won't you? I want to talk over Cranny's birthday present. I have thought of something, but I don't know what you will say.

"Hastily,

"C. L. W."

"You were good friends, I judge?"

"Crandall White and I have been associated for twenty-five years," said Mr. Glaenzer. "There are not two men in the world closer to me. I knew the first Mrs. White well, and her children were as free in my house as their own. This second marriage is but seven years old, and the present Mrs. White can hardly be much older than my second daughter, even now."

"Oh—h! Then there is quite a difference—"

"White is fifty-four," said Mr. Glaenzer. "Clelia cannot be over thirty, and sometimes she looks nearer twenty-five. Frankly, I don't know her age, precisely. I have heard my daughter tease her about it. Frances says she is thirty, and I suppose she knows. They are great friends."

"She may be your daughter's friend, but she is not yours," thought Mr. Motherwell, that astute young man.

"Your daughter does not know—"

"She thinks Clelia is taking a cure somewhere, about something connected with reducing her weight. You know, the women, today—"

"I know," said Motherwell briefly. "Was—is Mrs. White quite well?"

"I have never seen her when she was not in perfect health," said Mr. Glaenzer.

"And happy? Contented?"

"If she was not so, I have never known any human being conceal it better," said Mr. Glaenzer instantly. "She has a remarkably even disposition."

Motherwell pondered a moment.

"Of course, Mr. Glaenzer," he said looking squarely at his host, "there is no use my going into this unless I have at least all the help you can give me. People don't do odd things, unless they are insane, without reason. Women's reasons are less complicated. I mean, they fill a more limited field, than men's. Were Mr. and Mrs. White happy together?"

"Mrs. White," the jeweler answered instantly, but choosing his words carefully, "has been, ever since I met her (always taking into consideration her exceptional beauty and the fact that she is young enough to be her husband's daughter) a devoted and loving wife."

"And Mr. White."

"Mr. White's attitude can only be described by one word—infatuation!" said Mr. White's friend quickly. "His first marriage was like any other—romance, domestic life, friendship. But when he brought Clelia to this house, a year after poor Nettie's death, I saw that he had never been in love before. If anything has happened to her, Mr. Motherwell, he will die. I have not the slightest doubt of it."

"Where did he meet her—was she—"

"She was nobody in the world but a beautiful girl," said Mr. Glaenzer, "and never pretended to be anything else. Her name was Clelia Lee, and she was a distant connection of a poor and gone-to-seed branch of the Virginia Lees. When interested ladies—you know how kindly and how interested our New York ladies can be?—asked her about this Lee and that Carroll and all the rest of it" (the man of a hundred generations smiled slightly) "she told them just what I have told you. It really left them very little to say, I thought.

"One or two of them didn't invite her, I believe, but after Crandall took her to London, it was a little embarrassing for them, because she created, as they say, a furore, there. They don't know a drayman's daughter from a Colonial Dame, you know, over there," said Mr. Glaenzer, smiling mildly. "And now, Mr. Motherwell, you know as much as I know—which is no more than everybody knows," he added.

"Except," the young man suggested gently, "what Miss Lee was doing before she married."

"As to that, I can only say that White told me that she was recommended to his attention by a French friend of poor Nettie's—an old governess. She duenna-ed a baker's dozen of music students in Paris, and this girl, she told him, had come direct from a convent in the South, over here somewhere, on a scholarship. She knew all about her. Had any amount of letters. She was as good as she was beautiful."

He paused and sighed. It was evident that he was worried to a degree.

"You see, Mr. Motherwell, my poor friend didn't go to the music halls," he said. "He might have married anyone he liked, I suppose. If he happens to love beauty more than anything on earth, and found it, with a reasonable amount of love into the bargain, from a woman who is one of the frankest I ever met—poor Crandall, I'd give up anything but one of my own children to bring her back!" he groaned and put his hand over his eyes.

"You think, then, that she won't come back?" Motherwell asked quietly.

"Come back? Come?" Glaenzer repeated scornfully. "Get back, you mean, I think. What but the most dreadful necessity could take her away? Does that letter sound like an eloping wife? And why should she go? Adored, literally adored by a man who would cut out his eyes if she wanted them set in a dinner ring! Pearls, a yacht—you know, Motherwell, anything on God's earth she wanted! His children friendly, even, which isn't always to be expected, you know. And such a man! Such a character, such distinction, such brains, and believe me, Motherwell, more charm than I ever found in one of your countrymen! What do you make of the letter, Motherwell?"

"I think, as anybody must think, of course, that she was forced to go, for some reason, or thought she was, and that she couldn't have liked it, because she cried when she wrote it. I think that she may have been intimidated by threats against her husband's life—perhaps her own, but I should say his."

"Because of that part about his not needing to be frightened to death, though she was?"

"Because of that, yes. There has been no suggestion of any ransom?"

"None at all. Crandall has stayed at home ever since, or would have, until I warned him that he could not conceal his trouble from the servants. I sent him to Atlantic City, and it is understood that they are both away for a little. He can be reached in a few minutes, of course."

Welsh Iron Age Relics

Relics of a primitive civilization 400 B. C. have been discovered on the Merthyr Mawr Warren, Wales, between Porthcawl and the Ogmore river, which furnish definite proof that early Iron age men settled on the Glamorganshire coast. On the trackless wastes of the dunes, hidden by the shifting sands of centuries, is a watch tower that served castles of Ogmore and Candleston. It was near this tower that finds—mostly by accident—were made. They consisted of medieval pottery, flint arrow heads, and bones of extinct animals. Private digging operations followed, and there was found a brooch which fixes the date of the settlement as 300 or 400 B. C.

What Nerve?

"You Americans use such farcical and funny expressions," avers an English visitor addressing the Quest. "For instance, I often hear husbands alluded to as 'henpecked.' Please tell me what that means?" "A henpecked husband," elucidates the editor, "is a man whose nerve is in his wife's name."

WRATH OF WRITER "DEBUNKER" STIRS

Attack on Cleveland's Fish Stories Too Much.

If these darned iconoclasts don't let up, soon there will be nothing a-tall for us to cherish and revere. They've gone and ruined that hatchet-and-cherry-tree Washington story, proved that Pershing never said that "Lafayette, we are here," destroyed our belief that Pennsylvania was named for Penn the Quaker, tried to convince us that Pat Henry was a barroom loafer and never delivered that "Give me liberty or give me death" oration, and proved that Webster's last words, "I still live," were a final effort to get a noggin of rum.

We have stood all this without much complaint. But at last we are fed up with the destructive acts of the iconoclasts. We rebel, revolt, arise in wrath and utter words of scorn and contumely. We call for volunteers to rally to our standard and march against the whole gol-swizzled, bespectacled tribe of smug and self-satisfied iconoclasts. The last effort on their part will really be the last if it is within our feeble power to make it so. When Cap Lee of Gawgah, suh, up and told us that Grover Cleveland wasn't a real fisherman, and that he, Lee, hired a bunch of pickaninnies to fasten bluefish on the Presidential hook, it was too much; too much. Darned if we're going to allow anybody, captain, sailor before the mast or supercargo, to erase from our memory the picture of Grover, head crowned by a wide-brimmed and tattered straw hat, sitting in a boat and hauling in fish, legally and legitimately caught. Caesar may not have crossed the Rubicon, Washington may not have heaved a silver dollar across the Potomac, Leander may never have swum the Hellespont, Grant may not have been present when Vicksburg fell, Franklin may not have brought electricity to earth on a kite string, Fulton may never have constructed a steamboat and Marconi may not have discovered wireless telegraphy, but b'gosh, Grover Cleveland caught his fish on his own bait, on his own hook, and without outside assistance, and that's that.—Omaha World-Herald.

"Holy Thorn" Draws Throngs of Devout

Visitors to Glastonbury at Christmas see the celebrated "Holy Thorn," which blooms at Yuletide. Romantic tradition informs us that the thorn sprang from the staff of Joseph of Arimathea, who came here bearing the Holy Grail. The tired saint stopped to pray at Wirral Hill (Wearyall), leaning on his staff, and "lo, when the prayer was ended the staff had taken rot and blossomed."

And so the "Holy Thorn" was reverently tended till the Seventeenth century, when it was hewn down by a fanatic, who cut off his own leg in the process.

But slips had been taken from the parent thorn, and one of them is still growing in the beautiful grounds of the venerable abbey, while another overshadows the Chalice well.

This is another legend-haunted spot, for here men say St. Joseph buried the Holy Grail, and immediately a spring gushed forth and was found to be tinged with the holy blood of the Redeemer, and has ever since shown a reddish color.

Actually, it is a chalybeate spring, and a redding fungus grows on the surface, but it has been an object of veneration for many centuries.

It was visited by Saxon and Celtic saints, St. Patrick, St. Brighid, St. Aldhelm and St. Dunstan, and by numerous kings, while King Arthur himself is said to have been buried nearby.

There are traces of pre-Roman masonry in this wonderful well, and there is little doubt that it was a holy well resorted to by the devout for centuries before Christianity.—London Times.

"Primitive Areas" for Parks

For the benefit of large numbers of people who crave the "back to nature" type of forest recreation, the forest service is establishing "primitive areas" in each of the national forest areas. The idea is to leave unimpaired unique natural values and give to the public so inclined an opportunity to experience conditions which existed in pioneer phases of the nation's development. Tourist parks filled with little cabins, facilities for cooking, running water, showers, etc., are a boon for the traveling, sight-seeing public, but there are thousands who will enjoy, appreciate and help conserve these "primitive areas" which will eventually form a part of all our national parks of sufficient area.

Odd Traffic Directing

High up in the signal control tower at the Detroit municipal airport a man stands as planes come in, directing traffic with a barrel-shaped object 18 inches long and 8 inches in diameter. It is fitted with pistol grips and triggers. As the planes hover in close the man can be seen pointing the "weapon" at them. It is an aerial traffic light which is visible only to the plane at which it is pointed. When the red light shines the pilot must circle some more, but when he spots the green the field is clear for him to bring his plane down.

Starving

A woman appeared in court recently with a demand that her alimony be increased.

"But," protested the judge, "if I remember rightly, it was agreed by all parties concerned, that your present alimony was amply sufficient to support you and your children. None of you are starving, are you?"

"No, your honor," admitted the woman readily enough, "but my car is. You must realize that a car can't live without gasoline any more than children can without bread and butter."

Furrow to Stop Fires

For the purpose of heading off forest fires, a piece of mechanism has recently appeared which is reported to be effective. It is a powerful tractor with a wide plow fixed in front. The plow is used for constructing fire lines to prevent the spread of forest fires. It can make a furrow 15 inches wide and will throw out the dirt 10 inches on either side, making a fire line almost four feet wide. It will accomplish in one hour work that would keep ten men busy for a whole day.

Haul for Firemen

Every time the San Francisco firemen go out on a fire they come home with a hatful of trout. Fire Chief Brennan says the fish come through the fire mains, sometimes clogging up the lines. The trouble is caused by trout spawn slipping through screens over the intake to the fire hydrant mains and inter growing up to be good-sized fish.

"Work First, Then Rest"

Spelling Honor Roll: Melvin Larson, Elda Benitt, Doris Larson, Angeline Augustine, Marilyn Oakey, Orvus Benitt, Elroy Benitt, Margie Swan and Lloyd Lindholm.

Ethel Larson, one of our Second Graders, fell down one day last week and hurt her head so badly that she had to miss three days of school. We were very sorry. Ethel had been neither tardy nor absent before.

The Seventh and Eighth Graders are reviewing "The Period of Colonization." In Citizenship they have completed a study of the national government.

We have two new songs in our song books. They are "Holland Maids" and "The Little Black Boy." We have made song books in which we copy all the new songs that we learn.

Miss Saastad is reading the story "The Bluebird" for opening exercises in the afternoon.

The Program Committee is busy now preparing an Easter program.

Lloyd and Margie, our First Graders, have new Reading books. Ernest Sorter, who just began school, knows some of the colors and some words.

The lower grades are planting Courtesy Gardens. Each time that they perform some act of courtesy or do a kind deed they plant a flower in their gardens.

We will have an Easter vacation beginning next Friday.

The Biggest Little Paper In Marshall County

HOLT WEEKLY NEWS

Issued Weekly From The Home Of The Biggest Co-operative Creamery In Marshall County

One Dollar Fifty Per Year In Advance

H. O. Hanson, Publisher. Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota; Friday, March 25, 1932. Volume 21; Number 48.

Local Creamery Patrons Produce L. O' L. Cream

For 12 month:
 Mrs. Nels Engebretson
 Wm. Steinhauer
For 11 months:
 Fred Steinhauer
 Theo. Sorum
For 10 months:
 John Simonson
For 9 months:
 Louis Wegge
 A. O. Thompson

Those who delivered Land O'Lakes cream throughout the entire year received a milk stool each as recognition of their good work in taking care of their cream. Those who delivered Land O'Lakes cream for a smaller period are commended, and urged to better their record if possible.

It is hoped that we will have a dozen more patrons on the all-year-round Land O'Lakes Honor Roll for 1932, and that the future will have a better outlook in regard to butter prices.

Let's co-operate in producing quality butter!

Baudette to Get Int'l Bridge

President Hoover has signed a bill that was passed by congress recently for a traffic bridge across the Rainey River at Baudette. V. W. O'Conner of St. Paul will build the bridge which will cost about $250,000.00. Work on the structure will start in a short time and Mr. O'Conner states that he has everything ready as to financial backing and equipment.

Death of T. Saastad

Another one of our pioneer settlers of this community passed on to the great beyond on Sunday morning.

Truls O. Saastad was born in Snarum, Norway, January 25, 1847. Emigrated to America in 1872. He lived at Eau Claire, Wisconsin a few years and then came to Marshall County where he homesteaded and lived until his death on March 20th at the age of 85 years.

He was first married in 1884 but his wife died shortly afterwards. In 1888 he was married to Emma Hanson who survives him. The following children mourn his departure: Mrs. A. M. Juhlin, Indianapolis, Indiana; Ole Saastad, Alberta, Canada; Mrs. Lorenz Edwardson, Bemidji, Minn.; Eli Saasted also of Bemidji; and Christian of Holt and fourteen grandchildren.

He also leaves two brothers, Ole and Erick Saastad and one sister, Maren Engebretson all at Modom, Norway; one brother, Andrew in Vancouver, British Columbia; a sister, Mrs. Liza Hagen of Stanwood, Wash., and C. O. Saastad at Holt.

Funeral services were held from the Rinbo church on Tuesday afternoon. Rev. O. J. Haukeness officiated.

The weather in this part of state has been somewhat unsettled the past week. We have had changing cold winds and a few fluries of snow. As we go to press the wind is from the south and indications are that we may get some warmer weather.

Several crows have been seen here the past week. This a sure sign that prosperity is around the corner. Oh! Oh! We are so used to saying this that we slipped up on it again. Really we meant to say it was a sign of old spring around de cona.

Knocker vs. Booster

When the Creator had made all good things, there was still more things to do, so he made the beasts and reptiles and poisons insects, and when he had finished, he still had some scraps that were too bad to put into the Rattle Snake, the Scorpion and the Skunk, so he put these together, covered it with suspicion, wrapped it in jealousy, marked it with a yellow streak, and called it

A KNOCKER

This product was so fearful to contemplate that he had to make something to counteract it so he took a sun beam and put it in the heart of a child and brain of a man, and then wrapped these in civic pride, covered it with brotherly love, gave it a mask of velvet and a grasp of steel, made it a lover of fields and flowers and manly sports, a believer of equality and justice and called it

A BOOSTER

And ever since these two were created, mortal man has had the privilege of choosing his associates.

The Federal Seed Loan

Applications for Federal Seed Loans for this year will be taken at the Marshall County State Bank and all applicants are requested to be prepared with the following information:

Number of acres planted and harvested for the years of 1930 and 1931 which, will include all feed crops such as corn, alfalfa and wild hay.

Statement of Seed, Feed and Grain now on hand.

Correct discription of lands on which seed will be planted.

If a renter, waivers to the extent of the lien to the Secretary of Agriculture and also statement as to how land is rented.

If occupied under contract for Deed, name and address of the owner together with waivers to the extent of the lien, and also statement as to cash or crop payments.

Financial statement of all applicants are requested.

All applications will be acted upon by the Advisory Loan Committee of Eastern Marshall County who will receive no remuneration although a small fee will be charged by the Marshall County State Bank for the application.

The movie film distributers have raised the price so high on films that, they forced the two boys that were running talkies here to go out of business for the time being.

County Farmer-Labor Party Held Convention at Alvarado

The Farmer-Labor party of Marshall county held their convention at Alvarado last Friday. State Senator R. T. Buckler and Mr. J. C. Pratt gave short talks. Among the resolutions adopted were the approval of the records of Senator Henrik Shipstead, Governor Floyd B. Olson, Lieutenant Governor Arens, and other members of the state administration, and the convention favored their re-election.

Senator Buckler was also endorsed as Farmer-Labor candidate for representative in Congress from this district.

Trade or fusion with other political parties was denounced. A uniform salary reduction of the more highly paid state officials was recommended, and a resolution made to urge Congress to pass a similar Salary Reduction Bill for all federal officials.

The pending State Income Tax amentment was also supported, and numerous other reform measures endorsed.

P. B. Malberg and John Sorum were chosen delegates to the district and state conventions.

Given Parcel Reception

Friends and relatives of Mr. and Mrs. Paul Anderson gathered in the Nazareth Lutheran church basement on Wednesday evening and gave them a parcel reception. The evening was spent in listening to a well arranged program, singing and visiting around. A delicious lunch was served at 11 o'clock. The newlyweds were given many nice and useful gifts.

SNAP Into It!

He's a success in business, it is true. But at home he's the worst kind of failure. Can't get along with his wife . . . easily upset . . . attacks of nerves . . . always tired out.

All this could easily be avoided with the aid of Fellows' Syrup, the perfect tonic. Man, how it peps up appetite and vigor! How it helps ease frazzled tempers and build up real energy. Just a single bottle may do you a world of good. Find out for yourself, by asking your druggist for a bottle of genuine Fellows' Syrup.

FELLOWS' SYRUP

Keeps Illusion of Sea

Capt. DeWalden Brown, old-time seafarer, has spent the past quarter of a century aboard a ship, but not once during that period has he been at sea. His home, where he has long enjoyed a hermitlike existence, is a houseboat which lies in a tiny creek off Dorchester bay, in Massachusetts.

Stiff, Aching, Sore!

Get quick relief this simple way

Here's the way to relieve painful lumbago without blistering or burning. Rub on good old St. Jacobs Oil. Quickly it draws out inflammation and pain. Wonderful relief comes ...in a minute! St. Jacobs Oil is just the remedy for aches and pains of Rheumatism, Neuritis, Lumbago, Backache, Neuralgia and sore, swollen Joints. Get a small bottle from your druggist.

Getting Interested

"Mother, I think Jack really intends to ask me to marry him."

"What makes you say that?"

"Well, last night we were looking at catalogues and when we came to baby carriages he asked which one I liked."

SORE THROAT

FIVE minutes after you rub on Musterole your throat should begin to feel less sore! Continue the treatment once every hour for five hours and you'll be astonished at the relief.

This famous blend of oil of mustard, camphor, menthol and other ingredients brings relief naturally. Musterole gets action because it is a "counter-irritant"—not just a salve—it penetrates and stimulates blood circulation and helps to draw out infection and pain. Used by millions for 20 years. Recommended by doctors and nurses.

To Mothers—Musterole is also made in milder form for babies and small children. Ask for Children's Musterole.

MUSTEROLE
BETTER THAN A MUSTARD PLASTER

Don't let the example of a man telling his troubles influence you to tell yours. He doesn't want to hear.

WAKES UP TO FIND SELF WITH 2 WIVES

Man Remembers Nothing of Second Marriage.

Kansas City, Mo.—Liquor, according to Peter Van Diest, thirty-five, who awakened in the police holdover one night recently to discover that he was the husband of two wives, causes a man to do some peculiar things.

Van Diest was arrested when wife No. 1, Mrs. Velma Diest, Kansas City, Kan., traced him there after he had been missing from home since the Sunday before.

The first wife also discovered during her search that her husband had acquired a second wife the day after his disappearance, without obtaining a divorce.

The twice married man was in a repentant mood after his arrest and during the time of his arraignment in the justice court on a charge of bigamy.

News to Him.

"That second marriage is sure news to me," he told a detective. "I left home Sunday to take a motor car ride and I met one of the fellows. He suggested a little drink and I took one. Of course that called for another and I guess I must have gotten pretty drunk, because the next thing I remember was waking up here three days later.

"What news—some policeman told me I had two wives," he moaned. "Lord, it's hard enough to care for one the way that times are.

"I was sure there was something wrong, because I could remember only one wife, Velma."

Mrs. Fern Wells, wife No. 2, told police that Van Dies apparently had been drinking when he called at her home Sunday and began making love to her. However, she didn't believe, she said, that he was in such a condition that he didn't know what he was doing.

Mrs. Wells said she met Van Diest once before, but had never kept company with him. When he called at her home he painted such a glowing picture of what they could accomplish together as man and wife that she agreed to marry him, she said.

She said that the difficult time she had to earn a living for herself and small daughter had prompted her to accept the proposals.

Big Job Nonexistent.

The fact he told her he had a wonderful job, paying a huge salary, awaiting him in Arizona also influenced her decision, she admitted.

Van Diest, according to Mrs. Wells, awoke the day after their marriage, borrowed $5 from her with which he planned to hire a taxi to take him to his last place of employment to obtain money to take his bride and stepdaughter on their honeymoon to Denver.

It was during his absence with the borrowed money that the first wife appeared.

Mrs. Van Diest was in an unfriendly mood when she conferred with detectives.

Mrs. Wells said that she would stand by her husband, despite the fact that she is wife No. 2, acquired illegally.

Quarrel Between Young Lovers Ends in Suicide

Washington. — "Lucy: Good-by, sweetheart, I am going to join my mother. You can get another boy friend, now, who has a car, money and can dance. Elmer."

This note, telling how a quarrel between youthful sweethearts ended in tragedy, was left on the bureau in the room of twenty-year-old Elmer Tippens, in the 200 block Fourteenth place N. E. It was written just before the youth ended his life by firing a .22-caliber rifle bullet through his head.

Miss Lucy Body, sixteen, of the first block Todd place N. E., a friend of his family, came to the home to see Elmer's sister. The sister was not at home.

The girl told the police she had quarreled with young Tippens earlier in the day. A Casualty hospital interne who examined his body said the shot probably killed him instantly. Tippens was unemployed and lived with his brother-in-law.

Rubber Tube Provides Food for Patient, Six

Columbus, Ohio.—For 19 months six-year-old Alan Holycross, in a hospital here, has not swallowed food, yet he is in perfect health. Two years ago Alan swallowed a cupful of lye water and burned his esophagus so badly that he could not swallow food.

Almost starving, he was taken to the hospital. An incision was made, and a rubber tube was connected with his digestive organs. Six times a day nurses pour liquid food through the tube. Doctors hope that in six or seven years he will again be normal.

Believe Petrified Logs Part of Ancient Fort

San Antonio.—Four petrified logs, believed to be ruins of Santa Crus de Cibolo, an ancient Spanish roadway garrison, have been discovered by a party from the Witte Memorial Museum here.

The garrison was built in 1734 near Karnes City by Governor Sandoval, according to Col. M. L. Crimmins, a member of the exploring party. Ancient documents show it was erected to guard the highway from San Antonio to Matagorda Bay.

Spends 20 Years in Jail; Going Back for 5 More

Milwaukee.—William Lovely, forty-five, who has spent twenty years in Wisconsin penal institutions, was sentenced to five years in the state penitentiary following conviction at Racine on a burglary count. Testimony disclosed that the gun Lovely drew on the policeman who arrested him here was stolen by him when he burglarized a Racine soft-drink establishment.

Iowa Hen Makes Up for Vacation Days

Keokuk, Iowa.—One of H. B. Hopp's hens lays an egg every day, but on her "working days" the hen's egg is of unusual size.

Hopp says the chicken regularly lays a double egg weighing approximately six ounces. The outer shell, measuring six inches by nine inches in circumference, contains another complete egg in addition.

Pavement Fall Kills Deer

Medford, Ore.—A deer slipped on the pavement north of here and broke its neck. Needy families had venison.

Western Indians Fight for Fishing Rights

Portland, Ore.—Indians along the Columbia river are on the warpath, after many years of peace.

They seek, however, to settle their grievances in the white man's courts.

Members of the Yakima, Warm Springs, Umatilla and Lapwai tribes have entered formal protest against asserted violation of treaty rights by private property owners near the Dalles.

The landowners, the Indians say, prevent them entrance to and use of their ancient fishing grounds.

The treaty of 1885, by which the Indians deeded their property over to the government, provided in exchange that the Indians were to be allowed all fishing rights and also called for exclusive reservations.

United States Attorney George Neuner has been authorized to bring suit against the private owners if necessary, according to the Department of Interior.

Enters Jail as Visitor, Held 30 Days as Guest

Fairmont, W. Va.—Harry Davidson entered the county jail here as a visitor. He was detained as a guest—against his will—for thirty days. When guards searched him they reported finding a half pint of whisky. He was fined $100 in addition to the jail sentence.

First Jailbreak in 1791

York Village, Maine.—One of the first jail deliveries in American history occurred here at Ye Old Gaol, built 278 years ago and now a museum. In 1791 five prisoners cut some bars and escaped.

AIR TRIP MADE HISTORY

Coast-to-Coast Flight 11 Years Ago a Thriller.

Chicago.—Aviation history was written in the skies eleven years ago when air mail pilots made an experimental transcontinental night flight over unlighted airways to demonstrate the value of flying mail at night as well as by day to influence congress to make appropriations for the lighting of the present coast-to-coast airway.

Of the nine pioneer pilots engaged in that historic flight made over unlighted airways and in old war-time planes, all but one are living and six are still flying. Three of them, Ray Little, Frank Yager and Jack Knight, now fly mail and passenger planes on the same route, which is operated by United Air lines.

After a night and day east-west flight had failed back in 1921, a relay of pilots pushed the west-east transcontinental mail from San Francisco to New York in 33 hours and 20 minutes, at an average speed of 103 miles an hour.

Starting from San Francisco, Farr Nutter and Ray Little scaled the Sierras before dawn and were at Reno. Pilots Jack Eaton and Captain Bill Lewis flew the two planes from Reno to Elko, where Jimmy Murray flew the load to Cheyenne. Then the night section of the flight began, as Frank Yager roared through the falling darkness toward North Platte. There Jack Knight swung into the cockpit and at one o'clock in the morning landed at Omaha. There was no relief pilot, but the big stunt was not off. Knight volunteered to fly the next leg from Omaha to Chicago, although he had never flown east of Omaha. He landed at Chicago before daybreak. Jack Webster took the mail on to Cleveland and Ernie Allison, who is now piloting air mail planes in China, climbed the Alleghenies and landed on Long Island.

That flight started an appropriation which resulted in the expenditure of approximately $1,000,000 on the lighting and improving of the New York-Pacific coast airway, which now carries nearly one-half of the nation's air mail and on which United Air lines last year flew more than 6,500,000 miles.

OUT FOR DECATHLON

Frank O'Bryan, University of Nevada football and track star, ready to get into action at Reno as he grooms himself for a possible berth on the United States decathlon team in the 1932 Olympics. Wit and Humor

PROOF

They were in earnest conversation.

"By the way," said Clarence, "have you heard about William?"

"No," said his friend. "Not married, surely?"

"No," said Clarence; "but he's in love with Miss Brightheart."

"Really. Did he tell you?" asked his friend eagerly.

An Annoying Day

"Why is your wife in such a bad temper today?"

"She was annoyed with the maid and then she became annoyed with me because I was not annoyed with the maid, and then she was annoyed with herself for being annoyed with me because I was not annoyed with the maid."—Buen Humor, Madrid.

SYNOPSIS

In concern over the disappearance of the young and beautiful wife of his wealthy friend, Crandall White, Aaron Glaenzer engages Motherwell, private investigator to find her. A note from the missing woman warns her husband not to call in the police, saying she "hoped to come back." Mrs. White is younger than her husband, and his devotion has been the talk of New York. Her leaving him is unexplainable.

"What," said Motherwell after a moment, "does he expect to do, in case she doesn't return, after a reasonable time?"

Glaenzer spread his hands blankly. "What can he do? After that letter, he would not dare appeal to the police. 'Lely means what she said,' he told me."

"That is," Motherwell corrected, "she means that she had to write it. It's not very difficult to understand that she may have felt that she had to, at least."

"You mean, that this may not be her feeling at all, but a dictated phrase, more or less?"

"And in that case, it's simply the threat of any criminal."

"Of course. We thought of that. And yet—" said Glaenzer slowly. "She may have meant it, Mr. Motherwell. We have to remember that. And if she did—then she never will come back."

"You think so?"

"Clelia White is one of the most even-tempered women I ever knew," said Mr. Glaenzer, "but she is also one of the most determined. That letter sounds very much like her, Mr. Motherwell. What does she say there? —'Remember that, I mean it.' Personally, I think she does."

"You mean that you think she wanted to disappear like that?"

"I don't say that. Of course she couldn't want to. But I think that she thought she had to. I admit frankly that that doesn't sound to me like a dictated letter, Mr. Motherwell."

"Of course," said the young man, "there is this. It might not be dictated in form, but in spirit. I mean, she may have been told what to say, and allowed to say it in her own words."

"Yes, that is possible," said the jeweler.

"It was evidently decided in great haste, all of it. The paper it's on, the chaotic way it's written, the repetitions, the utter lack of preparation, the fact that she leaves the alibi to her husband."

"But, my dear young man," Glaenzer interrupted hastily, "people don't make elaborate preparations for being—" he stopped suddenly.

"Being what?" Motherwell asked. "Come, Mr. Glaenzer, you know you don't think Mrs. White was abducted!"

"No, I don't," the jeweler agreed shortly. "You're very clever, Mr. Motherwell, I don't. As a matter of fact, people don't abduct rich men's wives. Children, occasionally, but the letter naming the ransom usually comes along quickly."

"Perhaps," Motherwell suggested thoughtfully, "they're afraid the average rich man mightn't pay such a large ransom for his wife! But it so happens that in this case the rich man would. I take it there are no children?"

"None."

"As a matter of fact, it wouldn't be at all impossible to abduct a rich man's wife," Motherwell persisted. "I admit it's not a fashionable crime, but it could be done. He would pay anything, wouldn't he?"

"Anything he owns."

"Then it will be easier."

"Easier?"

"Why, of course. It's much easier to find a woman who doesn't want to be lost than one who does. And one thing that makes it easier in any event, in this lady's case, is her spectacular beauty. It must be fairly difficult to keep such a person unnoticed, I should think. Do you know what she had on, when she left the house?"

"No," said Glaenzer despairingly, "we don't. And we can't very well ask. I made Crandall telephone her maid from my house."

"What did he say?"

"Why, let me see—he said, 'Coggeshall, your mistress has decided suddenly to stay out of town. She's not quite up to the mark, I'm sorry to say, and wants you to pack her clothes for a few days—negligees and simple things, you know. Send them to the office, and I'll take them.'"

"I suppose you don't know what she answered?"

"Why, yes, as it happens, I do. I asked him, because I wondered, of course, just what the servants were thinking. You see, she hadn't been back all that evening, and Crandall was nearly wild. She only said, 'Is that so, sir, I'm truly sorry. I'll pack directly, sir. I suppose she won't want you to bring any of her jewels, sir?'

"So then he said no, and I nudged and whispered to him to ask if she had enough, or something like that. I thought it would be an excellent chance—"

"Exactly, and had she?"

"'I'm sure she had only her wedding ring and guard, Mr. White, and the Medusa, of course,' she answered."

"What's the Medusa, sir?" Motherwell asked.

"She has it on," he said.

Against an evening dress of iridescent white, cunningly massed against her marvelous skin, there shone but one jewel, a lambent green thing as large as a silver dollar, or nearly. In low but exquisitely clear relief was cut upon it a woman's beautiful face, framed in a mass of tossing serpents, too tiny for belief. At first you thought them wild locks of hair, merely, but in a moment you knew them for what they were and wondered, since the painter was so gifted, what must the gem-cutter have been!

"Whew!" Motherwell exclaimed, "what a wonder! It's jade?"

"Its only equal is in Peking, I believe," said Glaenzer. "I gave it to her as a wedding gift. She took an absurd fancy to it and always wore it —called it her lucky piece."

"This doesn't look as if she'd been spirited away for her jewelry, does it, sir?"

"No," said Glaenzer quietly.

"Didn't she wear more than that, usually?"

"Always, when I have seen her."

"What, for instance?"

"Her betrothal ring—a large black pearl set in diamonds; a small triple string of pearls, usually; a sapphire link bracelet, perhaps. The Medusa she wore as a brooch, either at her neck or sometimes as a pendant to the pearls. But she always wore it."

Motherwell considered a moment.

"Her maid has said nothing more?"

"Oh, yes. She went directly to White the next morning and asked if her mistress didn't want her. He said he understood not, but would make sure. This morning she asked if the clothes had been satisfactory and if there was any message for her. He said yes, of course, and that there was none. This noon she called me up here at about five and asked if any message had been sent her from Mrs. White. I said not that I knew of.

"'I'm sure she'll send, if she requires you, Coggeshall,' I told her, and she answered rather dispiritedly, 'Yes, sir, I suppose so?'"

"She's English, I suppose?"

"An extremely high-class woman for that position. She is devoted to Clelia and earns, I imagine, all of her undoubtedly high wages."

Mr. Motherwell looked into the fire in silence, and his host forbore to break it. At last he spoke.

"I'm afraid you'll feel yourself leaning on a broken reed, Mr. Glaenzer," he said slowly. "If I was one of these Johnnies in a book, now, I'd have taken a lot of notes and asked a few piercing questions, and dashed off and arrested somebody—Mr. White, for choice. But the only thing I can do is to wait until something strikes me. This is really very difficult, you know. I'm afraid I think it looks rather bad for Mr. White, sir."

Glaenzer groaned.

"Don't!" he said, and went on after a moment. "On the contrary, Motherwell," he said, "you impress me very much. Very much indeed. But I am a little surprised that you don't notice one thing—I thought you would have."

"In the letter, you mean?"

"Yes."

"What thing, sir?"

"Why, this odd sentence," said Mr. Glaenzer. "Poor White and I have worn our brains out over it. Yet you skip over it very easily. Perhaps you didn't notice it, though."

"You might read the sentence," suggested Motherwell.

Mr. Glaenzer took the letter and read.

"'I told him that I tell you know I love you.' Told whom? Poor Crandall thinks her brain was upset—"

"But you think she simply made a slip, in her excitement?" said Motherwell quietly.

The older man gasped slightly.

"You—it's hard to conceal one's feelings from you, my clever young friend," he said. "I suppose that's what I meant, yes. But anyway, what does it mean?"

"'I told him that I (would) tell you'?"

Wilson's Easter Gift

Speaking of Presidents, the late President Woodrow Wilson was very fond of children and they reciprocated his affection. One morning at Easter time, the Presidential party went to a local Presbyterian church. A little six-year-old girl in the next pew divided her attention between the President and a package in her lap.

During a pause in the service she leaned over and handed the President a package. He turned around, smiled and bowed to the child as to a queen and treasured the package until he got outside, when he opened it like a boy, and found that it was a gaudy Easter egg.—Washington Post.

Twenty Hours of Sunshine

The great Alpine crags and hills, except for patches of everlasting snow, are a marvelously covered carpet of flowers, grasses and mosses, many of which are found only there. The sun is warm, sometimes very warm. Birds flit and warble everywhere. Brooks make merry music the livelong day and it is a day that lives longer than elsewhere, for the sun shines for about 20 hours out of every 24 and the remaining four hours are a highly luminous twilight. Waterfalls, big and little, tumble over scores of hills into the bluest of lakes and over the heavily frosted hills the most comfortable trains will carry you where you will.

Old and New Faith Blended in Japan

When you understand Japan, "heathendom" will never have quite the old significance again. The future of Christianity there lies not above other faiths, but beside them intricately entwined.

When Japan takes on the new, she never utterly neglects the old; and just as Christianity made her own the ineradicable superstitions of ancient countries, so Buddhism and Christianity alike incorporate customs and beliefs held too tenaciously to be rooted out.

A friend has told me, out of long and intimate experience with the Japanese, the story of a young man of noble blood who very early became a Christian. He married the daughter of a samurai and she embraced her husband's faith.

Years followed of happiness, then of deep anxiety and death. Their eldest child, a beautiful girl not seven years old, died after a devastating illness. My friend, bound to the young couple by bonds of old and close affection, went to the house of death. The stricken father met him at the door, the smile of welcome as ever on his lips, while in silence he drew back the shoji of the inner room.

There was the mother, kneeling, and beside her the dead child, white as the pear blossoms without. In the child's right hand the mother had placed her Bible, and across her breast lay her father's sword, naked and shining.

The Word of God was there to guide her to a better world. But while her spirit groped through mortal confines the rustless blade of the samurai made everything of evil keep its terrified distance.—Ellery Sedgwick, in the Atlantic Monthly.

Prized Gray Hairs Went Into Discard

A young advertising man has long been handicapped by the fact that, while young, he is not nearly so young as he looks. His youthfulness of appearance has often caused persons in authority—such as traffic policemen—to treat him with a degree of condescension rather painfully noticeable. His office boy, whose appearance is one of slightly premature maturity, is everywhere treated by subway guards, box office employees and garage attendants with infinitely more respect than he ever can achieve.

This persistent youthfulness has worried him, mildly, for ten years or more. It was, therefore, with something near real pleasure that he welcomed the first gray hairs. He envisioned himself as, at long length, attaining the dignity of appearance he had come to covet—partly because so many people absent-mindedly addressed him as "boy." The gray came along nicely. It spread along the sides of his head. He approached maturity. Then his wife, embarking on one of her periodical campaigns to smarten him up, insisted that he keep his hair cut shorter. He explained the need to the barber.

He emerged from the shop pleased with the idea that he now looked like an alert young executive. He dropped in at a soda fountain and sat waiting the busy dispenser. Finally the dispenser, a lad of about twenty, turned to him.

"And what is yours, young man?" he inquired.

The advertising man looked in the mirror. The barber had cut the gray away.—New York Sun.

"SICK HEADACHE?"

IT is not necessary to give-in to headaches. It is just a bit old-fashioned! The modern woman who feels a headache coming on at any time, takes some tablets of Bayer Aspirin and heads it off.

Keep Bayer Aspirin handy, and keep your engagements. Headaches, systemic pains, come at inconvenient times. So do colds. You can end them before they're fairly started if you'll only remember this handy, harmless form of relief. Carry it in your purse and insure your comfort while shopping; your evening's pleasure at the theatre. Those little nagging aches that bring a case of "nerves" by day are ended in a jiffy. Pains that once kept people home are forgotten half an hour after taking Bayer Aspirin! You'll find these tablets always help. If you get real aspirin, you'll get real relief. In every package of genuine Bayer tablets are proven directions which cover headaches, colds, sore throat, toothache, neuralgia, neuritis, sciatica, rheumatism, etc.

The tablets stamped Bayer won't fail you, and can't harm you. They don't depress the heart. They don't upset the stomach. So take them whenever you need them, and take enough to end the pain.

IT SEEMS FANTASTIC

A Story of Persistent Love

By Fannie Hurst

(© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service.)

THE fact that he was married to Gladys Cowper was to remain a phenomenon to John Bayley. That the lovely Gladys should ever have found in him sufficient attributes to claim not only her interest but her love, was something that even in the second and third year following their marriage, was to remain a miracle in the eyes of John.

First of all, Gladys, above everything, was so alive. She radiated a vitality that seemed to demand so much more than the sedentary life in a cottage which the young clerk in a large wholesale floral and tree nursery was able to provide her.

Gladys, before her marriage, had been the center of a group of youths eager to provide her with more than John could. She had lived her girlhood so recklessly in the spirit of dance, frivolity and adorable nonsense!

It gave a man pause to have come into the vast inheritance of a creature of this irresistible love-of-life. It gave him pause and more than that, it gave him the urge of high ambition.

A man had to justify his good fortune in having won a wife like Gladys. More than that, if a man wanted to hold her, he had to earn the right. John realized all this.

It gave him a sense of pride and at the same time filled him with a sense of torment.

What if the turn in the tide of his affairs was not to come in time? Gladys was so young, so unconsciously keyed to attract all who came within her orb. Even on the street, heads swung after she passed. In a group she predominated. A young husband had to look to his p's and q's.

Not that Gladys herself ever gave off the slightest awareness of the extent to which she kept her husband pitched to tiptoe. The first years were just happy, love-in-a-cottage; an adorable wife and an adorable, good-looking young husband, who could be serious one moment and play-boy the next. True, resources were low. The position of clerk in the tree nursery was not remunerative and Gladys was filled with little wishes that tugged at John's heart.

"Darling, do you think we'll ever be able to afford just a second-hand little coupe? Wouldn't it be too heavenly having one to rush around in?"

"Oh, John, fancy being able to buy the mink coat in that window. Honestly, if I had just an imitation one, I'd curl up like a sardine and die of happiness."

"Oh, honey, would I love a duck of a bungalow like that! Do you think we'll ever be able to afford one half as nice?"

John did think, a great deal. There was, of course, much to be said in behalf of his work at the nursery. The offices within walking distance of their tiny suburban cottage, were set in the midst of acres of growing roses, aisles of spicy carnations, glowing riots of fuchsias, marigold, phlox, gladiolas and madonna lilies. From the window beside his desk, far as the eye could reach, there billowed the shining, tender green of young leaves and the wind-swept waves of color. It kept a man a little drunk with just the sense of rising sap and growing vegetation. It kept him somewhat young, and in a strange ashamed way, reverential toward the beauty of the world about him.

All very well and good from John's angle. Pleasant, unhurried work. The delightful proximity of his small home and lovely wife. The days that ended peacefully with Gladys waiting for him at the end of the floral pergola that led from his office to the high road. All very well and good. But it got a man nowhere. One hundred and fifty dollars a month earned in the heart of a garden, got a man's wife nowhere.

Not that Gladys complained. Of course they talked and planned for a future, but there was something frighteningly indeterminate about that future. At best he, John, could only hope for an increase of from fifty to seventy-five dollars a month. Unless, of course, the unforeseen happened, and he managed to wangle his way into the firm. That, however, was unlikely, or catastrophe could bring that about, and there were two husky young sons between him and the ultimate dream of membership in the firm.

Be that as it may, it must be said for Gladys that while she hankered for so many of the good things denied her, there was not in her attitude either rancor or bitterness. Just a wistfulness, and it was that wistfulness which, somehow, broke John's heart, and at the same time filled him with fear.

There was a country club set in the suburb where the Bayleys had set up their home. While not part of it, Gladys had opportunity to observe, from the remote vantage of sidelines, the gay-spirited existence of the polo-playing, hunting, golfing, dancing and motor doings of neighborhood couples about their own age.

Evening after evening the strains of dance music floated to them from the adjacent club house and sometimes, over the top of his newspaper, John could see the foot of Gladys, seated at her handiwork, tapping, tapping, to the rhythm, as if it were all she could do to hold herself in leash.

Never a word, dear darling, but John grew afraid, particularly as never an evening that Gladys did not meet him with this or that recital of what hearsay she had been able to pick up about the country club crowd.

Well, John decided to himself, it was just as well it was happening, and above all, it was good that he was realizing it before something concrete came along to jeopardize his happiness. This way at least, he could take the step while there was time. Without this stimulus, he might be content to go on to the end of time in the pleasant fastness of his position and the perfection that was his in his marital relations.

It was about this time that he decided to take the situation in hand. Wall Street seemed to present the first rung in his ladder. Not in the gambling sense! John was too shrewd for that. The way to wedge in was as bond salesman. Various of his friends had worked their way into brokerage positions and finally wealth by way of that intermediate step.

John did not intend to risk one penny of his two thousand dollars savings. Rather, he would get out of his rut into business that promised a future.

The way to hold a beautiful, restless young wife was to widen her horizon. The way to keep pace with the younger generation around them was to live a little dangerously.

A man was a fool not to realize that.

Gladys, at first quite bowled over by the proposal of the radical change in their lives, admitted, however, to seeing the wisdom of a young man's alertness to his future.

Of course a small apartment in New York would be more diverting, and then there was John's future to consider. Naturally, a vigorous, up-and-coming young fellow, fairly bursting with ambition, must have his chance.

Curious, she told herself, how well John had kept this ambition in leash during those first few sweet peaceful years of their marriage! She had been lax and absurdly bovine in not discovering the latent restlessness in his makeup.

It was not easy dismantling the house. It was an absurd little affair, built like a gingerbread cottage, and almost buried behind foliage and shrubbery that the nurseries had bestowed upon young Bayley when he married.

It was not until they were stripping the little garden of the furniture that together they had built and painted, that there arrived the moment when the equanimity of Gladys collapsed.

There were more tears than she had ever in her life shed and all in a volley, a revelation out of the blue.

"Oh, John—must we—must we—of course, I know it is for your good—a young fellow must have his chance—his future—but can't you stay back here, darling—and work toward it—quietly—just us. I haven't wanted you to know it, dearest, but it is breaking my heart to move into town, as just another wife of just another nervous, harassed bond salesman in just another flat."

Of course, the cat was out of the bag then. The most joyous bouncing elated cat imaginable.

The Bayleys still live in their gingerbread house.

It seems fantastic, but then life can be fantastic. The two sons who stood between John and membership in the floral company's firm were tragically killed on the same field at polo.

Abuse of the Modern

I am indignant when I hear something abused, not because rudely or ungracefully framed, but simply because it is modern.—Horace.

Totals	$103,300.00	$ 56,965.65

I further certify that the probable amount to be collected by the County of Marshall within one year from the date of this certificate applicable to the payment of the principal and interest of the county's outstanding drainage ditch bonds to become due within one year from the date of this certificate on account of the above mentioned ditches in said county will not exceed the sum of Fifty-six thousand nine hundred sixty-five and 65-100 Dollars ($56,965.65).

I further certify that this certificate is made pursuant to chapter 72, laws 1923, as amended by chapter 198, laws 1925, and that it is made preliminary to the adoption of a resolution by the county board of Marshall County, Minnesota authorizing the issuance of its drainage funding bonds for the purpose of making up the shortage created as above set forth.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and the seal of said County this first day of March 1932.

Levi G. Johnson,
County Auditor of Marshall County, Minnesota.

The following resolution was offered by A. S. Rokke, who moved its adoption:

Whereas the County of Marshall in the State of Minnesota at various times between the years 1910 and 1931 did legally make, execute and deliver its certain bonds in the aggregate sum exceeding the sum of $222,956.95 for the purpose of constructing drainage ditches and paying bonds and interest issued on account thereof, and which said bonds were issued to various and sundry persons and corporations, for value received, and $103,300.00 thereof are now outstanding and unpaid and $56,965.65 interest thereon is now outstanding and unpaid and which will become due within one year from the date of this resolution, and the further sum of $62,691.30 has been expended in payment of its drainage bonds and interest thereon out of moneys not belonging to the ditch or ditches on account of which the same was so paid; and

Whereas the aforesaid governing body deems it is for the welfare of said County of Marshall to issue its bonds to the State of Minnesota to refund $165,591.30 of its obligations aforesaid, being the item of principal to be paid on outstanding bonds within one year from the date of this resolution and the item of shortage in its drainage fund created by payment of principal and interest on drainage bonds out of moneys not applicable to the payment thereof as set forth in this resolution.

Now, therefore, be it resolved, by the governing body of said County of Marshall, at a duly called meeting thereof, legally held on the first day of March 1932, a quorum being present, that under and by virtue of sections 1959 to 1968, General Statutes of Minnesota, 1923, and chapter 72 laws 1923 as amended by chapter 198 laws 1925 of the State of Minnesota, shall for the purpose of refunding said bonds and replacing said shortage issue and negotiate to the State of Minnesota, its refunding bonds in the aggregate amount of $165,591.30, dated from issue, bearing interest at the rate of four and one-quarter per centum per annum, to mature and to be of the following respective numbers and amounts as hereinafter set forth.

1. One bond for the sum of $15,591.30 payable July 1, 1937.
2. One bond for the sum of $10,000.00 payable July 1, 1938.
3. One bond for the sum of $10,000.00 payable July 1, 1939.
4. One bond for the sum of $10,000.00 payable July 1, 1940.
5. One bond for the sum of $10,000.00 payable July 1, 1941.
6. One bond for the sum of $10,000.00 payable July 1, 1942.
7. One bond for the sum of $10,000.00 payable July 1, 1943.
8. One bond for the sum of $10,000.00 payable July 1, 1944.
9. One bond for the sum of $10,000.000 payable July 1, 1945.
10. One bond for the sum of $10,000.00 payable July 1, 1946.
11. One bond for the sum of $10,000.00 payable July 1, 1947.
12. One bond for the sum of $10,000.00 payable July 1, 1948.
13. One bond for the sum of $10,000.00 payable July 1, 1949.
14. One bond for the sum of $15,000.00 payable July 1, 1950.
15. One bond for the sum of $15,000.00 payable July 1, 1951.

and the proceeds arising from the sale thereof to be used for the purpose of refunding said bonds, and replacing said shortage, and no other; that the treasurer of said County of Marshall be and he is hereby authorized and directed to make application to the State Board of Investment of Minnesota for a loan of the amount and character and upon the terms and conditions herein specified; that all other officers are authorised and directed hereby to make, execute and deliver such papers and to furnish such information in connection with said application and the issuance of bonds pursuant thereto as may be required by said State Board of Investment; that upon the approval of said application by said board and the chairman and auditor of this governing body be authorized and directed hereby to sign and execute such bonds and the treasurer to countersign the same and deliver them to the State of Minnesota, and upon receipt of the principal sum thereof said Treasurer is hereby directed to apply the same for the purposes of refunding the said bonds and replacing said shortage and not otherwise."

The motion being duly seconded by A. N. Lodoen, a member of said governing body, was put to a vote and prevailed unanimously—yeas 5 and nays none. O. J. Johnson, Chairman of Board.

Petition for establishment of County Aid Road in Townships of New Maine and West Valley, laid over.

On motion made, seconded and carried, meeting adjourned to March 2nd, 1932, at 9:00 o'clock A. M.

HENS ON KNEES CRY FOR COD LIVER OIL

Chickens cry for cod liver oil! They even go down on their knees and beg for it. Most flock owners have seen chickens in this condition, but have not always understood the hen's language well enough to know what they meant. Miss Cora Cooke, poultry specialist of the agricultural extension division, University Farm, comes out with the explanation, prompted by reports that the trouble is common just now in the state.

"During these winter months," says Miss Cooke, "hens that 'go down on their legs,' even though apparently in laying condition, are simply saying that they miss the direct sunshine and all its benefits and that they'll get up and get busy when cod liver oil is fed to help take its place. Feed one pint in each 100 pounds of mash.

"Cod liver oil for laying hens does a few other things. It builds stronger shells, reduces the number of soft shelled eggs and eggs broken in the nests, prevents egg-eating and makes eggs hatch better. In some cases it even makes larger eggs and more of them. No flock owner in Minnesota can afford to feed his flock for winter laying without adding this small quantity of 'bottled sunshine'."

Sent Away for Using Scent

Under King Henry VIII of England subjects who used scent were sent away—for varying terms. Henry abhorred perfume and made a law against its use, says Aromatics Magazine.

Financial Statement

—of—

MARSHALL COUNTY, STATE OF MINNESOTA

For the Fiscal Year Beginning January 1st, 1931, and Ending December 31st, 1931.

Office of County Auditor,
MARSHALL COUNTY, MINNESOTA
Warren, Minnesota, January 4th, 1932.

To the Honorable Board of County Commissioners,
Marshall County, Minnesota.

Gentlemen:

I herewith submit to you a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the County during the year 1931, also an itemized account of the warrants issued upon the Treasurer during said fiscal year, also a summary of the accounts collected for and turned over to each of the school districts, townships, city and villages, also a statement of the financial condition of Marshall County at the close of the past and beginning of the present year, including all debts and liabilities and the assets and means to discharge the same.

Respectfully submitted,

Levi G. Johnson

County Auditor.

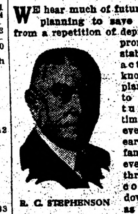
GIVES NATIONAL ECONOMIC PLAN

By ROME C. STEPHENSON

Former President American Bankers Association.



R. C. STEPHENSON

WE hear much of future economic planning to save the nation from a repetition of depression and promote more stable business activity. I know no better plan to suggest to insure future better times than that every wage earner, every family and every business throughout the country lay down as soon as they are able a program of proper savings as the foundation of their financial policy.

I know of no better plan than this to build for the nation as a whole a stronger economic situation,—that is, through a common structure of individual working, earning and saving. And I know of no better plan to revive activity in a depression than to spend a proper volume of past savings to keep the momentum of business going. But unless there are savings in prosperity there cannot be spending during depression.

Those who practiced this plan during the past period of prosperity have a security and a protection against present adversity that could be provided in no other way. Those who did not are the ones who are now most dependent upon others. If there had been more preaching of this doctrine when it was more feasible to put it into effect than it is now, there would be less depression and less financial insecurity.

However, while there should have been more emphasis on savings during prosperity, a measure of the emphasis today might properly be the other way,—at least to the extent that those who can safely do so may well increase their spending instead of overdoing their saving. While many have seen their earnings fail, there are millions who have not suffered so seriously in respect to the real purchasing power of their incomes. If we listened to all the scare stories of the day, one might get the impression that everybody was out of a job and nobody's business was earning anything. Many of our people who are able to continue a normal program of prudent buying are curtailing their expenditures beyond reason.

A Business Stimulus

The sum total of this unreasonable curtailment of spending is an economic influence contributing to the stagnation of trade. By the opposite token, I believe the resumption of normal spending on the part of those who are able to do so would be an important tonic toward the stimulation of trade. I do not mean by this that we should have indiscriminate spending merely for the sake of spending, but the very motive power of our economic life is the interchange of goods, and unless we have that we cannot have prosperity.

I strongly believe that we are at that point in the depression stage of the business cycle that any sound stimulating influence will start a real movement in the direction of a return toward prosperity. So much of the weakness of the old state of affairs has been liquidated, so many maladjustments corrected and such large volumes of our consumers' goods have been used up or worn out that the pressure of necessitous purchases must sooner or later be felt. When that time definitely comes we may consider it the first impulse of a new era of normal business.

When Government Aids Agriculture

Demand for relief, agricultural or otherwise, comes naturally from those who feel most keenly the impact of economic pressure. Those most affected fly quickly to government for aid. But too frequently agencies set in operation by governments simply postpone inevitable readjustments. The basic laws of supply and demand have never been permanently and successfully set aside. So in general governmental intervention that artificially stimulates prices or even maintains them when the prevailing economic situation obviously shows that readjustments are inevitable are expedients that yield only temporary relief rather than permanent cure. Porous plasters may relieve pain for the moment but they rarely get at the seat of the real trouble.—H. L. Russell.

When army worms threatened the crops of Marshall County, Tennessee, information concerning the pests was made available by the College of Agriculture, and bankers immediately took steps to organize a war against the common enemy, calling mass meetings in their communities where complete facts and helpful recommendations for eradication could be put before the greatest number of people possible. This timely action saved the destruction of many fields of crops.

Delinquent Tax List

For Marshall County, Minnesota, for the Year 1930

State of Minnesota,
County of Marshall—ss.
District Court,
14th Judicial District.

THE STATE OF MINNESOTA, to all Persons, Companies and Corporations, who have or claim any estate, right, title, or interest in, claim to, or lien upon, any of the several pieces or parcels of land in the list hereto attached described:

The list of taxes and penalties on real property for the County of Marshall remaining delinquent on the first Monday in January, 1932, has been filed in the office of the Clerk of the District Court of said County, of which that hereto attached is a copy.

THEREFORE, You, and each of you, are hereby required to file in the office of said Clerk, on or before the twentieth day after the publication of this notice and list, your answer in writing, setting forth any objection or defense you may have to the taxes, or any part thereof, upon any parcel of land described in said list, in, to, or on which you have or claim any estate, right, title, interest, claim or lien, and in default thereof, judgment will be entered against such parcel for the taxes on said list appearing against it, and for all penalties, interest and costs.

You are further notified that at the expiration of five years from the date of the tax judgment sale pursuant to such judgment, each parcel of land sold at such sale, and not redeemed, will become and be the absolute property of the purchaser or of the State, or of his or its assigns, without further right of redemption and without any notice of expiration of the time to redeem the same.

Dated February 2nd, 1932.

A. C. SWANDBY,
Clerk of the District Court of Marshall County, Minnesota.

PATERNAL INSTINCT

A Story of Great Devotion

By Fannie Hurst

(© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service.)

WHEN people used laughingly and entirely without opprobrium to refer to Kester's matronly instinct, his children, particularly his daughters, had formed a sort of unspoken compact to retort with unanimity: "What's the matter with paternal instinct? Aside from being the best mother alive, he's the best father."

It was their subconscious way of protecting Kester from innuendo. As if unnuendo could have attached itself to the enormous-shouldered, six-foot parent of the brood of five youngsters who clustered about his tall knees, whenever these tall knees hove in sight.

Kester would not have minded had there been innuendo. Life was too big, too busy, too harassed, too delightful an affair, for fancied hurts or pricks to flourish. Well, if he had maternal instinct he hoped it was a jolly good one. Man with five growing, hungry, boisterous young ones needed pretty nearly every instinct there was. Lordy, what a gang! Five hungry mouths yawning up to him when he came home evenings, for all the world like beaky birds in their nest. Fellow got so he treated them precisely that way. Night after night, it was his custom to come home with a bag of one kind of fruit or another, in what the children called his "surprise pocket." Cherries, berries, plums, fruit balls, which he dropped into the little upturned mouths.

A blessed gang of ruffians was what Mrs. McMurty, who tended the brood all day, called them. A blessed gang of ruffians and their daddy no better than the rest, flinging them around from the minute he entered the house.

That scarcely held, because when Mrs. McMurty accused their daddy of boisterousness that matched his children's, her eyes were ridiculously out of key with her speech.

Her idolatry of Kester verged almost on the absurd. She used to cry over him while relatisg his various attributes to friends. "He's a saint; the man is disguised in an overgrown boy's clothing."

It was rather on the basis of an overgrown boy and his younger playmates that Kester rearer his children. A man left at twenty-eight with five small youngsters on his hands doesn't have time to work out a "system." At least Kester didn't. With the problem of earning their living, keeping the house together, educating them along the most economical lines possible and above all, keeping them happy, Kester plunged in without a theory.

So, in rearing his family, Kester was just himself. Easy, indulgent, ridiculously sentimental, unexacting, playful, the adoring parent and yet withal so much the idealist where his children were concerned, that their shortcomings, when they became serious, could actually unnerve him to the extent of making him physically ill.

For instance, Myron, the second boy and his cruelty to animals: The scene between Kester and his son the evening his father found him in a group of boys tying cans to the tail of a wretched street dog was one that Mrs. McMurty, to the day of her all-too-premature death, was to relate with her face smeared with pallor.

For a moment it looked as if Kester were going to beat his son; batter him across the sides of the head with his fists. Miraculously that did not happen. But a talk took place up in the fastness of Myron's room that was devastating in its consequences. All-night Myron sobbed in his bed, and Kester did not appear at breakfast. The evening following, Myron fell asleep in Kester's arms, listening to a jungle story which he had asked his father to repeat. He was a strange boy and man, Kester was. A father and a mother, too.

His brood grew and thrived. At seventeen the eldest boy was a high school graduate and already a draughtsman apprentice. Myron chose medicine, and Kester somehow, on his newspaper photographer's salary, began to make that possible. Two of his three girls moved along into quite considerable beauty and the youngest gave promise of something more than even that.

Of course there were set-backs, incubus of debt, worry or illness and occasionally the need of discipline of one sort or another. When she was fourteen, Leila, the second girl, developed typhoid fever and Kester nursed her as a mother would have nursed her.

The year following, the mainstay of the household, blessed Mrs. McMurty, died suddenly of heart stroke and that was a blow to Kester and his brood. Fortunately, Lily, the eldest, eighteen then, took over in total the duties which she had hitherto shared jointly with Mrs. McMurty, and Leila, Edmee, and the boys, all lent shoulders to the wheel of household. Kester as always shared the burden. Absolutely without sense of pride or artificial barrier, he would think nothing of coming home of an evening, washing out towels, helping drape one of his daughters into a half-made party dress, or assisting with the dinner.

False pride? Poppycock. Nonsense. No reason why a man shouldn't do whatever chores present themselves. Silly convention that certain duties belong to one sex or the other. He who hesitates is lazy.

As gradually his brood began to marry off, those household chores automatically grew lighter. At forty-three, Kester was a grandfather. At forty-five, his last child had left the nest.

Life, of course, was simpler now. Financial responsibility lifted, sons and daughters well on their own, his own vigorous health unimpaired, there seemed fortune and good future ahead for Kester.

Father will marry again, now, the girls decided among themselves, and affectionately set about scouting for timber worthy of him.

As a matter of fact, Kester's thoughts did turn that way. Even with their devotion, his children had their own interests now. Life was no longer the hurly-burly affair a growing family had made it. He had done a good job. The wife who had died bearing his last child would have blessed him for it. His tribute to her lay in his success.

Slowly, but rather definitely, Kester's thoughts began to turn to the desirability of meeting some woman. . . .

It was along about this time that Myron's seven-year-old son began to exhibit certain qualities in his little makeup that secretly, for months, had been disturbing his parents to no small extent.

On various occasions, for this and that flagrant offense, the child had been sent home from school, finally on his eighth birthday actually meeting with final dismissal from school authorities who could no longer cope with him.

For another six months secretly, and eager to spare his grandfather the fact, Myron and an adorably pretty wife struggled with the serious problem of this boy.

When he was nine, however, there came about the shocking occasion of Myron Junior being apprehended before the Juvenile court.

It was astonishing, the equanimity with which Kester took this mortal blow to his pride. As the wife of Myron put it, there was something actually heart-hurting about the way in which the grandfather of Myron Junior walked with the child out of court, hand in hand, quietly, and with a sweetness of manner that seemed to hold at bay the threat of violent hysteria which had hovered over the child during the courtroom procedure.

No doubt about it, father is simply a genius with children!

Kester himself evidently believes so. Myron Junior lives alone with his grandfather, in a small house they have taken on the outskirts of town. He is a serious, difficult, sometimes vicious little problem. There are some days when Kester cannot even report for his work. Myron Junior is one of those special cases that can baffle physicians, parents, teachers, alike.

Kester is sometimes baffled, but secure in the confidence that he can cope with his problem.

Father will never marry now, his daughters agree, a little sadly. His genius with children won't let him. . . .

Happiness of Americans Impressed on Visitors

The first characteristic of the American people is their happiness. The visitor feels himself in the presence of a race with a keen zest for life, a sure confidence in the future, and much enjoyment of things as they are.

The American is more highly strung than the northern European, and in most cases this does not seem to lead to pessimism or a morbid condition. The impression of happiness is common to all classes. The people in the streets, in the shops, in the hotels, the lift man, the bellhop, the telephone operator—all are gay.

No doubt there is a material basis for this. A double income for a wage earner means more than twice the amount of amenities and enjoyment. The orthodox tenet of European civilization, that "money does not bring happiness," is probably only a modern adaptation of Aesop's fable of the fox and the grapes.

Vast wealth does not bring happiness; but that small margin of spare money after necessities have been provided for constitutes in America the structure of what is definitely a larger life. In the United States this larger life—or rather, larger share of life in its natural and rightful balance—is enjoyed by an incomparably greater number than in any other country in the world.—Winston Churchill in Liberty.

"O. K." as Verb

Webster's dictionary does not give this spelling of the verb "okehed" or oked," but mentions "O. K." as a cant form, with past tense, "O. K.'d" and participle "O. K.ing." The form of the verb "okeh" or "okay" (with past tense "okehed" or "okayed") is in common usage.

Financial Giant Well Likened to Lightning

When George Baker, the banker, died, ninety-nine people out of every one hundred exclaimed "Who was he?" and yet Baker's fortune ranked with that of Rockefeller and like the oil king, he made it himself. Of course, Wall Street and the inner circle of finance had always known Baker, but to the general public he was a stranger.

Baker's passing recalls an encounter in which he, Tom Lawson and H. M. Rogers are said to have participated at the time the country was seething with frenzied finance.

Rogers, according to the story, was protesting against a certain exposure that Lawson had threatened to make, and Baker might be termed to escrow in the affair. And it was Baker who laid down the law.

"I don't care what you say!" stormed Lawson. "I'm going through with it."

"Oh, very well, but remember what I have told you," replied Baker mildly, and that ended the interview. Rogers hastened to tell his friends that everything was all right.

"But how do you know it's all right?" asked a friend. "Lawson still declares he's going through with it."

"But he won't," predicted Rogers. "Always remember—thunder makes a great big noise, but it's the lightning that really counts. And Baker is lightning."—Los Angeles Times.

Yom Kippur Judaism's Day of Self-Research

Yom Kippur is the Jewish Atonement day. The American Hebrew says: "Judaism lays emphasis on the call of the individual sinner and transgressor for a direct, personal straightening out of his moral and ethical account with men and with God. This is the reason why fasting became one of the chief observances of Yom Kippur. Let a man realize what a puny weakling he becomes when self-deprived of food and drink for 24 hours and he will be more likely to confess his wrongdoing; to repent the damages his selfishness and acquisitiveness may have visited on others, and repair them; to seek and to grant forgiveness. Let him for the space of consecutive hours in the atmosphere of a house of worship meditate on his deeds and misdeeds of a 12 month that is past; devote himself wholly to a contemplation of the numerous opportunities for well-being and well-doing which he cast aside for whatever reasons; place himself frankly before the bar of his own conscience, being at the same time his own accuser and his own judge, and, at the end of the Atonement day, he will emerge a better, a finer, a more sanctified spiritual being."

Food in Middle Ages

The instinctive feeling for color characteristic of the Middle ages is seen in the concern for coloring foods. Saffron was naturally a popular coloring material, but other ingredients served for red or green foods, and some dishes were even parti-colored. But, despite this appeal to the esthetic tastes, it is obvious that people in that far-off day were coarse feeders with palates dulled by spices, pepper, mustard, ginger and cubebs. Our Neo-medievalists who look back to the "great centuries" through the rosy glasses of romance would have had an uncomfortable time at a medieval banquet and a more uncomfortable time afterward. There were giants in those days and they possessed pantagruelian digestions. But the average expectancy of human life was short.

Orchids in Newfoundland

Many to whom the word orchid suggests tropical climes and hothouses may be surprised to learn Newfoundland boasts of many varieties, says Nature Magazine. The old favorite of the woodland, the pink ladyslipper, is fairly common, and Calopogon and Arethusa, rather rare forms, but known to many who search the treasures of New England meadows, are among the more beautiful frequenting this island. The northern green orchid, Habenaria hyperborea, denizen of the cold, wet woods, whose dense, narrow flower-spike sometimes grows to be 12 inches long, is plentiful.

Stone Prize of War

While it is true that the Rosetta Stone (so named from the place where it was found in Egypt) was discovered by a French army officer, Boussard, in 1799, and that through its means the deciphering of ancient writings was made possible by another Frenchman, Champollion, the stone itself remained the property of the Egyptian government and was ceded to the English at the capitulation of Alexandria, Egypt, 1801.

Not to Be Ignored

Only a three-year-old could so appreciate her own cleverness that she would interrupt an adult conversation about a party in order to have it told.

Mother and Mrs. K. were planning their bridge party when the little miss finally gained attention.

"And mother," she said, in a grown-up way, "tell her the cute thing I said the other day."

AMERICA'S WORLD RESPONSIBILITIES

By H. J. HAAS

President American Bankers Association

H. J. HAAS

WE are in a changing world, with many new financial problems for which we have no precedents, and many old problems which have so changed as to be unrecognizable. American bankers have been called into world affairs to blaze new trails of unknown finance. We may expect these calls to be more numerous in the future than they have in the past. We are the world's financial leader and we must accept the responsibility which goes with it.

Let us look to the future with confidence. Every one has experienced a great sorrow some time, perhaps so great we felt we could never overcome it, but time is the great healer and eventually we have come out of it. As it is with individuals, so it is with nations. Our nation has had much sorrow in the 155 years of its existence. In that time we have passed through the major depressions of 1837-1857-1873 to 1879-1884-1893-1896-1907-1914-192 and the present.

I venture to state that in each of these periods there were those who had doubts of the future just as we have them today, but what happened after each depression? Our country recovered, to be better and stronger than ever. Its people were introduced to modes of living they never dreamed of, until today, notwithstanding our depression, we live on the highest plane of any nation in the world. Should we not judge the future by past experience?

Surely our people are better prepared, financially and intellectually, to cope with even greater problems than they have been in the past, so why not look to the future confident that fundamental social and economic problems will be adjusted.

Confidence is not established by any one thing but by an accumulation of things. If we can get confidence started on its way, gathering a little here and there, it will accelerate its speed as it goes along. This is not the work of any one man to perform but is the cumulative effort of each and every one of us. What we are in the future is not the result of what we have done on any one day but the result of all that we have done for all time. The American Bankers Association is endeavoring to do its part. Individually our efforts may not count for much, but they are part of the whole plan and taken in the aggregate they amount to the sum total of all our efforts.

PUBLIC INJURED BY BANK GOSSIP

National Association Declares Community Interests Demand Protection Against Idle Rumors

BOTH in their advertising and in their direct contacts with customers and others, bankers should "consciously and persistently devote more time and thought to keeping people mindful of the fact that while the bank has many obligations toward its customers, equally is it true that the depositor also has certain obligations to the bank to enable it to properly maintain its position in the community," a recent statement of the American Bankers Association declares.

"A bank admittedly is a semi-public institution and there is a mutuality of obligation resting upon both the banker and his customers to maintain the effective functioning of that institution that is superior to the interests of either," it says.

Bankers might well consciously devote greater effort to building up the public viewpoint in their communities that due to their public obligations and burden of public interest, the banks are entitled to protection against ill-informed or malicious gossip and rumors, the statement says.

"As to banks in some states, bank slander laws afford this protection," it points out. "We recommend that this protection be availed of by definite action wherever practical both as a matter of immediate expediency and also to awaken public opinion as to the dangers of idle gossip about a community's banks."

Farmers should rid themselves of any false hope of outside aid from legislation. The only recourse left for the producer on a reduced price level is to produce his goods at reduced costs, and nearly every farmer can likely put into force a few economies in production. Farmers must produce as largely as possible the materials they use, and get away from cash purchases until prices come down proportionately on the things they buy. The cheapest way in the farming business is to raise your own feed and not let the other man get your dollars.

Here Comes the Band!

The local band is getting stronger and bigger as time goes on. This week the boys received a big new Sousaphone that will add not only to the tone quality of the band but also to its looks, as you know a nice big horn like that dresses up the background of the band.

A. L. Carlson is handling the new horn.

The way it looks now almost everyone who is a bit musically inclined is either in the band or contemplating getting some kind of instrument and sitting in with the bunch during practice. It won't be long now before we will see our boys in action at a big concert for the public of our community.

Grasshopper Poisoning

Marshall County this week took their first steps in a county wide organization to combat the threathening grasshopper pest for this spring. A bill now pending before congress specifies that free grasshopper poison will be distributed to all counties that has full township organizations willing to diligently perform the task of systematically distributing the furnished bait. T. L. Aamodt of St. Paul, a state and federal supervisor of this work on Wednesday of last week visited Warren and together with county officials appointed Oscar Pearson as county superintedent. Mr. Pearson's work as outlind will include a full organization of the county to be finished before May 15, and with one appointed chairman in each township who in turn are to appoint two or three men to have charge of certain sections of ground. Special information meetings in most of the townshigs will he held and, a poison distribution station will be maintained in each township.

According to information received by Mr. Pearson the grasshoppers hatch about June 1st and are in an incubation period for about one month later. During the latter half of this period and before the insects commence to fly is the ideal destruction period, and it is proposed to watch and at a set date the entire county be thoroughly baited in every township. It is believed that one baiting will be sufficient. Vacant and government lands will be baited just as well as occupied farm lands, and swamps unless they have been burned over.

Mr. Pearson expects to start his work in Eagle Point Township at once and will canvas the entire county during the coming month. Needed poison bait will be secured and everything kept in readiness, as great stress is placed on the necessity of meeting the grasshoppers at the right time. Marshall county has a large quantity of poison on hand since last year and more will be secured. It is expected that Mr. Pearson will visit this part of the county about the middle of April to make arrangements.

Wild Geese Move North

A flock of 5 wild geese were seen here on Tuesday. They were headed southeast and, left us wondering when we seen them, as to whether they were bringing up the rear of a flight that started south real late in the fall, and stayed up all winter or, if they were the advance agents for a flight that is soon due to start northward to the hidden spots of beauty in the wilderness of Canada.

Spring Weather

The weather here has been of a sort of mean mixture the past week. It started out on Sunday afternoon with a small shower of rain and a flury of snow. On Monday it started out nice but, it turned colder on Tuesday and a light snow fell that night. Wednesday and yesterday were both blustery days although we had bright sunshine.

Mrs. H. O. Hanson is spending some time at the St. Lukes hospital in Thief River Falls where she is having two operations. She is now feeling pretty good after the first one which she underwent on Tuesday.

Change Your Auto Plates

Yesterday, March 31, was the last day 1931 auto license plates may be used in Minnesota. Those who have received their plates and have not put them on should do so at once. Those who have not obtained their 1932 plates should apply immediately and quit operating their car or truck until it is properly licensed, a Highway bulletin advises.

The law provides separate penalties for delayed registration and for operating a motor vehicle without a proper license.

The penalty for delayed registration started with 25 cents a day for four days beginning Feb 16, after which it is $1 a month until it reaches $5.

W. C. T. U. To Meet

The W. C. T. U. will meet at the home of Mrs. G. Sanoden on Saturday afternoon April 2.

Chris. Gilbertson made a business trip to Elbow Lake, Minn., recently. He brought one of his boys down there to work.

C. F. Attwood of Fargo was up here last week and looked after the renting of his farms here and sold his share of the hay he had left.

Gilbert Sanoden has bought two fine dairy cows from Guy Anderson and has taken them down to his little farm in the south end of town.

Orrin Fredrickson returned home last week from Kindred, North Dakota where he has been employed at the home of his uncle this winter. His parents motored down there for a two day visit and brought him home.

Switchboard Meeting

The directors of the Farmers & Village Switchboard Company will hold their annual meeting here Monday. According to reports received at this office the affairs of the company are not so flourishing, due to the fact that many have failed to pay their telephone dues.

Now if the people of Holt and vicinity do not come and show some interest in the enterprise at this meeting we may not have a telephone central here much longer. You all knew that it is a necessity and that we can hardly afford to be without it, after having been used to it so long.

We urge the people of this community to come in and cooperate with the directors in straightening out the matter.

Infant Dies

Carl Willard, the 11 month old son of Mr. and Mrs. Ole Hamerness, passed away at their home on Tuesday evening. The cause of his death was given as the result of an infection of the throat from a bad case of tonsilitis. Funeral rites will be conducted this afternoon from the Rindal church near Rosewood.

CHILD need REGULATING?

CASTORIA WILL DO IT!

When your child needs regulating, remember this: the organs of babies and children are delicate. Little bowels must be gently urged—never forced. That's why Castoria is used by so many doctors and mothers. It is specially made for children's ailments; contains no harsh, harmful drugs, no narcotics. You can safely give it to young infants for colic pains. Yet it is an equally effective regulator for older children. The next time your child has a little cold or fever, or a digestive upset, give him the help of Castoria, the children's own remedy. Genuine Castoria always has the name:

Carry Medical Aid to Isolated Area

Women Nurses Do Splendid Work in Hill Country.

Washington.—The novel method by which a small group of women nurses have in six years brought medical care to a remote rural area, typical of many in the United States, where no doctor could make a living and the people were too ignorant and poor to care for themselves, are described in a study just published by the committee on the cost of medical care.

The report gives a glimpse of one of America's still existing frontier regions in the back country of Kentucky, where social and health conditions were all but medieval, and where it costs a dollar a mile to bring a doctor into the wilderness on a visit.

In a part of this district the Frontier Nursing service maintains its health outposts, whence nurse-midwives ride out on horseback to combat squalor, ignorance and disease. The study, by Anne Winslow, executive secretary of the service, tells how these women have succeeded at moderate cost in providing midwifery, nursing, surgical, medical, dental, hospital and social service for the region.

The portion of the frontier on which the service operates lies in Leslie, Perry, Clay and Bell counties. The organization was established through the work of Mrs. Mary Breckenridge, a graduate nurse who made the first survey in 1914, with a view of determining the health needs of the region and devising a way to meet them. Her visit was followed in 1925 by a survey in Leslie county by Miss Bertram Ireland, who worked in conjunction with the state board of health of Kentucky, to check up on unreported births and deaths.

Miss Winslow writes: "There was no physician in Leslie county, and in one contiguous area of three counties surveyed there were 15,000 people without one registered physician. In this area it took the nearest doctor six to twenty hours on horseback to reach a patient. Necessarily, the average fee of $1 a mile was prohibitive for all but a few families; the average total income per capita was under $143 a year."

"Epidemics of typhoid fever, diphtheria and smallpox occurred frequently," Miss Winslow continues. "Owing to their ignorance of any form of sanitation, the people were riddled with hookworm.

After Mrs. Breckenridge had visited the region she decided, writes Miss Winslow, "that the health of mothers and children was the most urgent problem and that the situation called for trained nurse-midwives, who might combine a program of public health and bedside nursing with midwifery."

The Frontier Nursing service grew out of this belief. It consists at present of 28 nurses on duty at nine nursing centers. The service maintains an 18 bed hospital, built three years ago.

Scattered through neighboring counties are a few doctors who can be called upon whenever necessary, and there is a surgeon in the nearest town, 23 miles from the hospital.

In their last fiscal year the nurses of the frontier service attended 9,736 people in 1,851 families, making 47,827 visits altogether.

The total cost of the service was $100,406.49 for the year, averaging $10.92 a patient, but the 9,736 patients served were able to pay only $3,367.43 of the total.

Jobless, Gets $1,000 for Finding $25,000 Gems

New York.—Charles Kane, forty-year-old jobless farmhand, shuffled along the Bronx river parkway near Hartsdale and stumbled on a valise containing jewels valued at $25,000.

He was "broke." So he "flagged" motorists with his thumb, begged nickels until he had 15 cents and called a telephone number he found in the valise. The valise belonged to Mrs. Robert T. Stone of New York. It had bounced out of a car driven by her sister, Miss Edyth McCoon. Insurance agents for Mrs. Stone paid Kane $1,000.

New Federal Prison to Have No Walls or Bars

Anthony, N. M.—The usual safeguards that prisons have to keep convicts inside will be lacking at the new $350,000 federal detention home being built near Anthony.

There will be no outside wall, no guard towers, no machine gun nooks and no alarm siren.

Evenn the familiar pack of bloodhounds used to track escaped men will be missing.

"The government does not contemplate any such things as breaks or riots," E. J. Brandt, one of the architects, said.

War Hero Is Now a Window Washer

David E. Hayden was found the other day in Los Angeles washing windows at 20 cents an hour. Nearly fourteen years ago, at Thiancourt, in France, he crawled across No Man's Land, a wounded officer on his back, disregarding machine gun fire to save his comrade's life. For this deed the United States gave him the Congressional Medal of Honor; France, a Croix de Guerre with two palms and a star and her Medal of Commemoration; Italy, her War Cross; Portugal, her rare War Cross. "To David E. Hayden, nineteen, youngest war hero," read the citations. "I'm not kicking!" emphatically declared Hayden, now thirty-three years old. "It's work, isn't it? Maybe not the kind I should prefer, but I want to work."

Youth and Girl Will Make Test of Love

Seek to Prove Wiles of Cupid Are Lasting.

Kansas City, Mo.—To prove that his wiles are lasting, Dan Cupid is about to be entered in a long contest with time, with the announcement of the winner to be made in five or six years.

The little fellow must stand by and watch the annulment of the marriage of Kathleen Stewart, fifteen, said to be a granddaughter of Col. Robert W. Stewart, chairman of the board of the Standard Oil Company of Indiana, and Paul T. Lange, Jr., eighteen, son of a Kansas City druggist.

Proceedings for the annulment were made at the direction of the brides' mother, Mrs. Robert Anderson.

Cupid may hover as close to his victims as he chooses while the girl pursues her studies at the exclusive Barstow School for Girls here and the boy attends college. These are the terms of an agreement reached by the bride, bridegroom and their parents.

If, at the end of the school year, Cupid is the master of the situation, Paul and Kathleen again may become engaged.

But then looms another separation, according to Paul T. Lange, father of the bridegroom. Robert G. Stewart of New York, father of Kathleen, has promised to send her to Vassar college for four years and Paul will begin a two-year course at the University of Kansas.

After that the winner of the contest between Cupid and time will be announced, and if the principals in the 1931 holiday romance still are as much in love they may be remarried with their parents' blessings.

The couple eloped to Merriam, Kan., and were married without the consent of their parents. Both gave their ages as over eighteen, to eliminate the necessity of obtaining their parents' permission.

Old Size Money Out Totals $573,000,000

Washington. — More than $573,000,000 in old-fashioned over-size paper currency is still lying about the country. This money, representing alomst 9 per cent of all the paper money in existence, is believed to be held largely by hoarders. Banks have long since ceased using it and have turned it in for exchange for the smaller and handier size.

Treasury officials say it is entirely too early to decide just how much of the money is being hoarded and how much has been lost, destroyed or removed from circulation channels in other ways.

Soviet Ex-Stammerers Speak at Convention

Moscow.—A conference of ex-stammerers took place here in which every delegate proved his right to attend by making a speech. Addressing the conference of former stammerers, Professor Vsevelod Kostchenko said that there are 2,000,000 persons with speech defects in the country and that practically all are curable. "Tractor" and "platiletka" (five year plan) are among the most difficult words for stammerers to pronounce.

Stillwater Vets Form a New Last Man's Club

Stillwater, Minn. — Another "Last Man's club" composed of veterans of the World war is being formed here.

The original "Last Man's club," composed of Civil war soldiers, held its last meeting and disbanded two years ago, with Charles M. Lockwood of Chamberlain, S. D., the last survivor.

The new club, to be known as the "Bully Beef club," is made up of 285 American Legion men identified with the Stillwater post, although all are not residents here.

Instead of the famous bottle of Burgundy wine that graced the annual banquet table of the original club, a can of "bully beef" brought back from France by Doctor Frissell of Browntown, Minn., will be the trophy of the new club. It is to be opened by the last survivor, probably 50 years from now.

Air Pilots Drop Papers to Lonely Homesteaders

El Paso, Texas.—Johnnie Martin and Paul Carpenter, air line pilots who fly between this city and Los Angeles, are welcomed daily by lonely homesteaders over whose property they fly.

Martin and Carpenter, although they never have met any of the homesteaders, know practically all of them by name, the result of letters of introduction to the airmen.

The two flyers drop daily papers to the homesteaders. One woman wrote them asking they write the correct time on the next paper they dropped her.

"My clock has stopped," she explained.

Radio Proves Its Worth at Rounding Up Bandits

Oklahoma City. — The Oklahoma county crime detection radio station has proved so successful that it will be expanded into a statewide system.

The principal aim of the system will be to capture bank robbers, which have become a menace to the state recently.

The station, KGPH, will be increased to 250 watt power. It was established originally as a municipal detective agency for Oklahoma City.

St. Marys, Kan.—A Kansas farmer, Ralph Hilton, has a real souvenir of the depression. Hilton recently killed a calf and sent its hide to a Topeka tannery. The hide brought 60 cents. The freight was 55 cents. Hilton received a check for 5 cents. He framed it.

When You CAN'T QUIT

Fatigue is the signal to rest. Obey it if you can. When you can't, keep cool and carry-on in comfort.

Bayer Aspirin was meant for just such times, for it insures your comfort. Freedom from those pains that nag at nerves and wear you down. One tablet will block that threatening headache while it is still just a threat. Take two or three tablets when you've caught a cold, and that's usually the end of it.

Carry Bayer Aspirin when you travel. Have some at home and keep some at the office. Like an efficient secretary, it will often "save the day" and spare you many uncomfortable, unproductive hours. Perfectly harmless, so keep it handy, keep it in mind, and use it. No man of affairs can afford to ignore the score and more of uses explained in the proven directions. From a grumbling tooth to those rheumatic pains which seem almost to bend the bones, Bayer Aspirin is ready with its quick relief—and always works. Neuralgia. Neuritis. Any nagging, needless pain.

Bayer-Tablets of Aspirin Genuine

Get the genuine tablets, stamped with the Bayer cross. They are of perfect purity, absolute uniformity, and have the same action every time. Why experiment with imitations costing a few cents less? The saving is too little. There is too much at stake. But there is economy in the purchase of genuine Bayer Aspirin tablets in the large bottles.

Engine Governs Speed

If a man will but build an engine powerful enough there is nothing to keep him from flying at a speed of 1,000 miles a hour, believes Squadron Leader A. H. Orlebar, captain of the Schneider cup team, members of which have already flown in excess of 400 miles an hour. "Flying at high speeds is a perfectly wonderful sensation," he said. "But there really is no big thrill. There is a much bigger thrill in tobogganing or skiing. If somebody will design the engines there is nothing in the human element to prevent airplanes reaching a speed of 1,000 miles an hour."

How One Woman Lost 10 Lbs. in a Week

Mrs. Betty Luedeke of Dayton writes: "I am using Kruschen to reduce weight—I lost 10 pounds in one week and cannot say too much to recommend it."

To take off fat easily, SAFELY and HARMLESSLY—take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen in a glass of hot water in the morning before breakfast—it is the safe way to lose unsightly fat and one bottle that lasts 4 weeks costs but a trifle. Get it at any drugstore in America. If this first bottle fails to convince you this is the safest way to lose fat—money back.

But be sure and get Kruschen Salts—imitations are numerous and you must safeguard your health.

MEDUSA'S HEAD

BY

Josephine Daskam Bacon

Copyright by D. Appleton and Company (WNU Service)

SYNOPSIS

In concern over the disappearance of the young and beautiful wife of his wealthy friend, Crandall White, Aaron Glaenzer engages Motherwell, private investigator to find her. A note from the missing woman warns her husband not to call in the police, saying she "hoped to come back." Mrs. White is younger than her husband, and his devotion has been the talk of New York. Her leaving him is unexplainable. She is known to have with her a remarkable jewel, the "Medusa's Head," but her maid, Coggeshall, thinks she had little else of value.

"Forgetting that Crandall knows of no 'him'?"

"Oh, no, I shouldn't say so."

"But you did notice it? You think you understand it, perhaps?"

"Why yes, I think it could be explained," said Motherwell absently.

"Then, perhaps you'd—" Mr. Glaenzer's tone was almost imperceptibly edged. He was very tired.

"Please excuse me!" he cried. "I got thinking—you know," he explained. "I read that part of the letter a little differently. If you will hand it to me—"

He took it, laid it on the arm of his chair, and bent over it, as if writing.

"'I am quite well—no one is hurting me—'" here he flung back angrily over his shoulder.

"'I told him that, I tell you,'" then again writing, "'You know I love you!'

"Doesn't that make sense, sir? She did tell him that before, you know!"

Mr. Glaenzer started.

"For heaven's sake!" he murmured, "for heaven's sake!"

"There's one 'you' left out, but she thought it was the 'you' of the sentence that was coming, you see. And in her excitement, she wrote it all down, just as she said it. At least, that's the way it seems to me."

"You mean that you think somebody really was there—"

"Why, naturally. Somebody who was hurrying her along, too. She must have written like lightning. Never dotted an i. And scared to death, I'm afraid."

"You can suggest nothing?"

"I can suggest one or two things. I don't mean that I think this lady couldn't be found. I think she's too beautiful and too young and has too many perfectly obvious reasons for getting back—if she can—not to be found, ultimately. But it looks to me as if she was afraid she couldn't see her way to getting back—very soon—to put it mildly. You can't get around that. And what staggers me is the short—the terribly short time at our disposal, Mr. Glaenzer. You can't lose one of the loveliest and richest young women in the country in broad daylight in New York, and expect to get away with it very long, can you? People, even if they are reducing their weight, can still write to their friends. How long will Mr. White hold out? How long can you fool the servants? What are you going to say? What's become of her? Everybody will want to know."

"She should have thought of that," said Mr. Glaenzer in a low voice. "What can Crandall do?"

"Of course," Motherwell went on, apparently not noticing this bitter reply, "of course Mr. White can say that she has been obliged to be put temporarily—"

"I suggested that, but he turned on me and refused pointblank," said Glaenzer. "He said she would never forgive him."

"Well, then, what does he want to do?"

"He wants you to find her," said the jeweler.

Motherwell laughed angrily.

"Because I'm not the 'police,' I suppose?"

"Just so."

"You don't think that's rather a quibble?"

"We think it's a pretty near thing," the older man admitted, "but we also think that she ought to be very glad of that 'quibble,' Mr. Motherwell, in case she wants to come back, and that she can hardly blame us, legally speaking, in case—"

"In case she doesn't? So he doesn't quite believe in her, either? Is that it?"

"He is only human," said Mr. Glaenzer, "and he is fifty-four, and she is barely thirty. Do you believe in her, Mr. Motherwell?"

"I don't know," said Motherwell, "but I'll go back tomorrow morning and try to find her!"

CHAPTER III

Bright and early on Saturday morning, a dark, distinguished gentleman, evidently quite at home in the White household, escorted up the old gold velvet of the much photographed stairway a slender, bearded young man in heavy shell glasses and a worn, soft, felt hat. In Mrs. White's little sitting room they were met by her maid, a severe Englishwoman of middle age.

"Good day, Coggeshall, good news from Mrs. White, I hope?" the friend of the family asked kindly.

"Indeed, Mr. Glaenzer, I've had just no news at all from Mrs. White," she returned.

"Well, well, I expect Mr. White will bring us plenty, when he gets back."

"To speak by Mr. White's voice on the telephone, Mr. Glaenzer, when last I heard it at eight o'clock this very morning, he'll not be leaving his bed, if he's wise!" the woman retorted triumphantly. "He's sent for Hollis already."

"Ah, well, a man under the weather needs his valet, really, more than ever, you know, Coggeshall!"

"And how about a woman, sir!"

"Well, well—"

Mr. Glaenzer looked drawn and preoccupied.

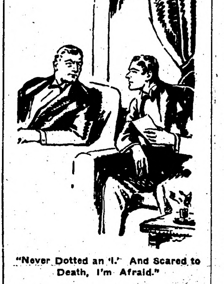
"I want to take all Mrs. White's jewels and have them gone over thoroughly, Coggeshall," he said. "They shouldn't be left here with both of them away, anyway. She keeps too much here. If you will give me the keys—or it's a combination, isn't it? my young man here will list them and give you a receipt. Meanwhile, I will telephone to Atlantic City."

"It's a key and a combination, sir, and Mrs. White keeps the key always. You'll have to get it from her," said the woman.

"Hasn't Mr. White a key?"

"He had, sir, but Mrs. White mislaid her key, and was alarmed some one should find it, and had it changed, and the combination, too. There only came back one, and she was vexed at the forgetting to order the two, but only last Wednesday (the day she left, sir) she mentioned to me that she could not seem to remember about ordering that duplicate key. So I am inclined to doubt he has one, Mr. Glaenzer."

"Then, in case of a fire, the safe would have to be taken out bodily?



"Never Dotted an 'I.' And Scared to Death, I'm Afraid."

No one but Mrs. White could get at it?"

"It looks so, sir," said the woman quietly.

"This is idiotic," the jeweler declared, and seizing the telephone he called up his establishment angrily, and demanded that the best "safeman" in the place be sent up to him immediately. Fuming, he paced out into the hall to wait and the young man was left alone with the maid.

"I'm sorry to hear Mrs. White is so ill," he said quietly.

"I don't know that she's so ill" the woman returned briefly.

"Ah, I'm glad to hear it," he said lightly. "You'd be the one to know, of course!"

She glanced at him suspiciously, but he was evidently barely interested. His ingenuous flattery came just at the right moment.

"There's more than you thinking that, young man," she announced bitterly, "but it seems I'm not the one, after all. It's not that I mind a lady's walking out, just as she is, and dressed more for what you might call—walking in the country on a rainy day, than for New York. But to be told to pack a bag with simple things—pah! What are 'simple things'? If a person's ill—well and good. If they're worried to death—well and good. But there's a difference in the clothes required," the woman announced.

The young man mumbled something about "a little of both, maybe," and began to write busily with his now sharpened pencil.

To which the English woman replied tartly, that all men were alike, in her opinion.

Real Gratitude

The obligations of gratitude, like all approved obligations, are a low form of morality. Real gratitude does not consist in loving a person who does us a service and in doing him a service in return. Gratitude consists in profiting by the service that has been done so that we can act as well as possible toward the man who did us the favor and toward all men, toward the whole of humankind and not only toward the individual to whom we are grateful. He has no right to anything more. Perhaps the service he has rendered turns out well for him, perhaps it brings him harm, but this is a secondary matter.—Frederic Paulhan in Nouvelle Revue, Francaise, Paris.

Fatness or Slimness

The tendency to be fat or slender is largely inherited, though most persons who are overweight can achieve a material reduction by proper habits of diet and exercise, says Hygeia Magazine. When one is underweight, there should always be an examination for organic trouble.

FAR-EAST BEAUTY SPOT IS HONGKONG

City Experienced Traveler Never Neglects.

Whenever an argument arises as to the most beautiful city in the Far East, the majority usually decide in favor of Hongkong. To have visited Victoria, which really is the name of the lovely waterfront city, invariably denotes the cosmopolitan, the world traveler who is at home and has friends in many far-flung corners of this interesting globe of ours.

Hongkong means "Fragrant Streams" and useful streams, too, so far as Great Britain is concerned, since the island controls the straits of Malacca and the straits of Formosa. It has an area of 30 square miles and is one of the world's foremost trading centers since much of the Asiatic commerce passes through it or has its being there. And banks, mines and factories abound, all plentifully financed. And, naturally, such commerce and trading means that many influential business men make their home in Hongkong and that attractive clubs, resorts and hotels flourish.

A well-built military road encircles the island and in the 22-mile drive can be seen some wonderful views and vistas. This drive generally means lunch, tea and dinner at one of the most picturesquely situated hotels in the world. The visitors usually visit the three main business streets, each one on a higher level, Queens road being the highest. Charming villas with exquisite gardens abound as one ascends the island and from the interesting botanical gardens with their rich plants and foliage one takes the funicular railway to the peak and then gives oneself over to the marvelous panoramic view that can be seen from that point. And for the fortunate traveler, an ascent to the peak by the funicular or by motor means a visit to one of the exquisite homes of the wealthy Europeans and American residents of Hongkong.

Most people visiting Hongkong make the trip to Canton which is on the Pearl river and a distance of 78 miles. From the river steamer one can watch the Chinese river life with its strange craft of various types. And now and again, gazing shoreward, a glimpse is obtained of pagodas, set against the dim hilltops.

Between Hongkong and Canton one can see the latest type of motor boat, magnificent passenger steamers, destroyers and, of course, the sampan—the boat that is really a houseboat, since hundreds of thousands of natives spend their whole existence in this type of craft, which has a small, curved shelter or living place in the middle.

The trip can also be made by railway, but despite the unpleasant aspects of the river trip, there are always many passengers who take the really fine passenger steamers. A city of contrasts is Hongkong—a city that entices the visitor back and provides interesting memories and travelogs when one's roving days are over.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Shooting Merely a Bluff

Some Latin-American countries resort to revolutions as a simple form of election and regard it as the best method for making a political change, Charles H. Cunningham, former United States commercial attache at Lima, Peru, said at St. Louis recently. "There is a lot of blank shooting done in some of the revolutions, with shots being fired mainly for effect," Cunningham said. "During some of the revolutions in Peru foreigners were allowed to transact business as usual in downtown districts, but were warned to keep off of certain streets where fighting was going on.

Reward of Merit

"A flying officer in Halifax said one day to a bunch of new recruits: "'Any of you chaps understand the principles of aeronautics?'

"A handsome young recruit saluted smartly.

"'I studied aeronautics two years at the 'varsity, sir,' he said, 'and besides I—'

"'That'll do,' said the officer. 'Step round back and clean the colonel's wife's electric refrigerator.'"

VANDALS NOT SOLE WRECKERS OF ROME

An unanticipated by-product of the wholesale excavations undertaken in Rome by order of Mussolini has been to clear the barbarian invaders of much of the stigma formerly attached to their name. As a result of the discoveries in the vicinity of Trajan's forum, Corado Ricco, director of excavations, has formulated the conclusion that earthquakes, internal strife, sheer carelessness and indifference wrought far more destruction in ancient Rome than did the barbarians.

One of the latest discoveries is a long colonnade of heavy pillars all toppled, leaning against each other like trees bent by a strong wind. Their destruction was not due to human vandals, but was traced to an earthquake in 801, when the city was under the papal rule of Pope Leo III. As the excavations have revealed increasing evidence that the barbarians were maligned, the director's work has intensified their study of the old historical records and they have been able to demonstrate that many buildings and temples supposedly destroyed in the "sack" of the city, were standing long after the last barbarian departed.

Much of the bad name of the barbarians may be due to the prejudiced reporting by the early Christians, who, as was amply demonstrated in the reports of persecutions under the empire, never let accuracy stand in the way of giving their enemies a bad name. Even without support from the most unprejudiced records to be found the archeologists in charge of the present work have become convinced by the massive size of the structure uncovered that the destruction of buildings by the invading armies was out of the question.—Washington Star.

Rub Musterole well into your chest and throat—almost instantly you feel easier. Repeat the Musterole-rub once an hour for five hours . . . what a glorious relief!

Those good old-fashioned cold remedies—oil of mustard, menthol, camphor—are mixed with other valuable ingredients in Musterole to make it what doctors call a "counter-irritant" because it gets action and is not just a salve.

It penetrates and stimulates blood circulation and helps to draw out infection and pain. Used by millions for 20 years. Recommended by many doctors and nurses. All druggists.

FIFTY-FIVE years old, and still going strong!

Do you want the secret of such vitality? It isn't what you eat, or any tonic you take. It's something anyone can do—something you can start today and see results in a week! All you do is give your vital organs the right stimulant.

A famous doctor discovered the way to stimulate a sluggish system to new energy. It brings fresh vigor to every organ. Being a physician's prescription, it's quite harmless. Tell your druggist you want a bottle of Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin. Get the benefit of its fresh laxative herbs, active senna, and that pure pepsin. Get that lazy liver to work, those stagnant bowels into action. Get rid of waste matter that is slow poison so long as it is permitted to remain in the system.

The new energy men and women feel before one bottle of Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin has been used up is proof of how much the system needs this help.

Get a bottle of this delicious syrup and let it end that constant worry about the condition of the bowels. Spare the children those bilious days that make them miserable. Save your household from the use of cathartics which lead to chronic constipation. And guard against auto-intoxication as you grow older.

Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin is such a well known preparation you can get it wherever drugs are sold and it isn't expensive.

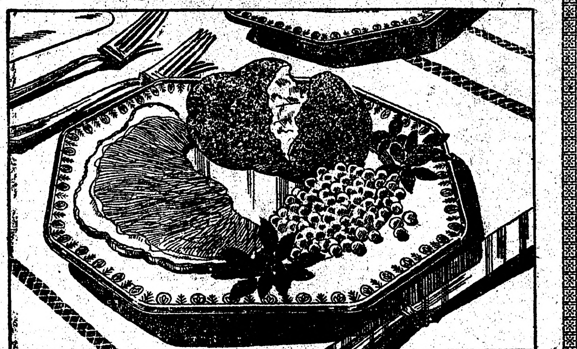
NUTRITIVE PEAS



AND now a noted food authority, from the sanctum of his scientific nutrition laboratory, tells us more definitely why peas are good for us. We all know why we eat spinach—"eat it and like it," dietitians have told us, "because it is full of iron which many foods lack"—and much has been said in like manner about carrots.

But most of us have eaten peas just because we liked them and have had only a very hazy idea about their exact dietetic worth. Here is the welcome news that science has to contribute apropos of canned peas.

"Canned peas are an economical source of protein and energy. In protein content, peas are among the richest of the members of the vegetable family. Nutritional research has established for the canning industry, the processes most conducive to conservation of the vitamin content of peas. As a result they are a rich source of vitamins A, B and C. It has been shown that the reheating of canned peas for serving, causes no appreciable loss of vitamin C, and the food thus prepared ranks with the richest vitamin C carriers, such as orange juice or tomatoes. In vitamin B content, canned peas are richer sources than orange juice or tomatoes.

"Although there is evidence that the calcium of peas is not as readily utilizable as that of other vegetables, canned peas are a good source of desirable mineral elements such as calcium, iron and phosphorus."

Do you know some of the interesting new ways to serve these valuable peas? The following are tested recipes:

Red Devil on Toast: Add two cups of grated cheese to the contents of one can of tomato soup, and heat until melted. Add the contents of one No. 2 can of peas, one-half of a No. 2 can of red kidney beans (or one cup), salt and pepper to taste, and heat thoroughly. Serve on toast slices and lay a crisp curl of bacon on each. This serves eight persons.

Creole Steak (which serves six persons for one dollar): Salt and pepper two pounds of round steak, and dredge well with flour. Brown on both sides in a little fat in a heavy skillet. Remove the meat, put in the skillet one green pepper which has been shredded and six small whole onions, and brown. Return the meat to the skillet, spread with a little prepared mustard, and pile the pepper and onions on top and around the steak. Add the contents of one 10-ounce can of tomatoes, cover tightly and cook slowly until very tender. Just before done, add the contents of one 11-ounce can of peas.

English Peas: Add one and one-half tablespoons vinegar, one and one-half tablespoons sugar and two tablespoons of crushed fresh mint to the contents of one 11-ounce can of peas, and simmer gently for ten minutes. This serves four persons.

Pea Timbales (which serve twenty-four persons): Drain six No. 2 cans of peas, and press through a sieve. To the pea-pulp add ten slightly beaten eggs, one and one-half tablespoons salt, one teaspoon pepper and three-fourths cup of butter. Then add three cups milk. Turn into well-greased molds, and set in a pan of hot water. Bake like custards in a very moderate oven, until firm and a silver knife comes out clean (300 degrees for forty to fifty minutes). If cooked too long or in too hot an oven, they will become like whey. Unmould on hot plate, and serve with a white sauce which contains drained whole peas (six cups of sauce to the contents of a No. 2 can of peas).

Scotch Broth with Peas (a very old recipe): Prepare three onions or leeks, one small cabbage, one carrot and one turnip and cut them into small pieces. Put four quarts of water, or stock, into a large earthenware pan, and when it boils, add two pounds of mutton (neck) and one cup of barley. Boil up, skimming frequently, add the vegetables and then simmer for three hours. Now stir in one extra carrot grated, a cup of canned peas, salt and pepper to taste, one teaspoon of sugar and a tablespoon of butter. Simmer again for thirty minutes. Add one tablespoon of chopped parsley and serve. This serves eight persons.

MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE SALE

Default having been made in the payment of the sum of $1523.54, which is claimed to be due and is due at the date of this notice upon a certain Mortgage, duly executed and delivered by George W. Nelson and Ida Nelson, husband and wife, Mortgagors, to State Bank of Viking, a corporation under the laws of the State of Minnesota, Mortgagee, bearing date the 8th day of March, 1928, and with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Marshall and State of Minnesota, on the 17th day of April, 1928, at 11:00 o'clock A. Birds Save Race, Says Munch

If all the birds in the world dropped dead today, not a man, woman, child or domestic beast would be living in four years' time, William Munch, veteran game warden of this district, told high school students in an address recently.

"The birds eat millions of insects and foul seeds every day," he said. "Without their aid in getting rid of these pests, we could not exist."

Mr. Munch, the oldest game warden in Minnesota in the point of service, is making a tour of state junior and senior high schools under the auspices of the Minnesota conservation commission.

"The jay alone will eat 1,000,000 moths a year," Mr. Munch pointed out. "Each woodpecker eats more than 5,000 ants a day. A single martin consumes 3,000 mosquitoes as his day's food. Every pheasant eats at least 100 different kinds of insects as well as 2,000 foul seeds every day.

"It has been estimated that in the states of Illinois, Massachusetts and New York alone 8,000,000 birds are killed each year by cats.

"The snakes, too, have an important part in the scheme of things. They do approximately $20,000,000 worth of good each year by the grubs and insects they eat."

Mr. Munch described the eternal triangle that exists between the skunk, the turtle and the duck. "The skunk is the natural enemy of the turtle, and the turtle is the natural enemy of the duck," he said. "Thousands of young ducks are saved every year by the number of turtle eggs eaten by the skunk."

Burn Grass Early This Year

"Farmers and others having grass to burn this spring should do so as early as possible," urges Dick Willems, district forest ranger. He suggests that "meadows should be burned in the evening when the wind is down. If on peat soil, a complete survey should be made to see that there are no hang-over fires in old burn-cuts or peat dumps.

"Early burning will also give birds more protection, will not hurt grass roots, and there will not be so much danger of fires getting away or doing damages," said Mr. Willems.

"Township officers and other settlers should report any and all unauthorized peat and other fires to the Forest Service in order that prompt and proper action may be taken to extingquish same."

W.C.T.U. News

The W. C. T. U. met at the home of Mrs. Gilbert Sanoden on Saturday, April 2, with eight members and four visitors present. Mrs. Ole Backlund acted as president.

After the business meeting had adjourned, booklets on the use of wine, alcoholic drinks, and smoking were read and judged. These booklets had been made by children in Grades 3, 4 and 5 in the local school.

The judges, who were Mrs. L. M. Redal, Mrs. Alfred Anderson, Mrs. C. A. Davis, and Miss Leona Davis found it hard to decide upon the best, and both teacher and pupils are to be complimented upon the excellent work done.

The decisions of the judges were as follows:

School Notes

HIGH SCHOOL

Chester Larson is librarian this week.

Helen Monson came back to school after Easter. We are all glad to know that she is off the sick list again.

It really isn't so very bad to get back to school after our Easter vacation.

The Biology class has decided that it is about time to bring food for their birdhouses.

6th, 7th & 8th GRADES

Lorraine and Bernice had the best sixth grade Geography papers Monday.

Gladys Nygaard is making an April calendar on the blackboard.

3rd, 4th & 5th GRADES

The fifth grade was making up poetry on some of the men they studied this year. Myrtle Halvorson had the best poems:

WASHINGTON
Washington was very true,
He never told a lie,
If his father asked if it was him
He'd always say, "'Twas I."

LINDBERGH
Lindbergh was a good man,
A good man was he.
He made me take a notion
When he flew over the Atlantic ocean.

1st & 2nd GRADES

The following children had 100 in Spelling the Thursday before vacation: Morris, Lois, LeRoy, Rubin N., Russell, Ruby Halvorson, Ruby Werner.

The second grade is beginning its study of Japan.

We all made booklets in which we are going to keep the record of our library reading.

We have finished "The Early Cave Men" in History and have started the study of "The Later Cave Men."

In Art class we are going to make a frieze on the Early Cave Men.

We have one more child in the first grade. It is Wayne Larson. There are also five beginners. They are Harley Engen, Clayton Olson, Clinton Castle, Oliver Backlund, and Yvonne Redal.

20 Years Ago

Items Clipped From The Northern Light for the Issue of April 12, 1912.

There was a lot of talk about a new railroad being built from Winnipeg to Minneapolis. It was to cross the Great Northern at Greenbush and come south on the east side of Thief Lake and Mud Lake and run in almost a direct line to Minneapolis.

The Erickson Brothers finished drilling a new well at the creamery. They found an elegant supply of water at a depth of 83 feet.

Guy Anderson and Ole Mattson made a business trip up to Middle River.

E. T. Eide came down from Spooner and stayed here to take care of his farm west of town.

Producing good cream
that makes good butter is as easy as falling off a log. Cleanliness is the word, next comes quick cooling. Cool with water the year around, don't let cream freeze, don't keep it in barns, caves, cellars, don't mix warm and cold cream together. Follow these simple rules to produce good cream.

School Apportionment Less

Public schools in Marshall county received a total sum of $14,501.72 in the annual March apportionment, which was about $2,906.37 less than last year, according to a report made out recently by Levi Johnson, county auditor. This apportionment was based on an enrollment of 4,006 students during the year and the payments were made on a basis of $3.62 for each student enrolled with the state paying $3 and the county 62 cents for each student enrolled.

Tax collections this year in Marshall county dropped much below the average collections for this county, between Nov. 1, 1931 and March 1, 1932, according to a report let out by Levi Johnson, county auditor. The collections this year totaled $114,544.59 while last year during this same period the total was $128,257, or a decrease of nearly $14,000, according to the report. Of this total this year, the schools received $37,245.24, the county $36,966.65, the state $10,345.95 and the rest to cities and townships in county.

Rev. and Mrs. R. E. Smith of Cavalier, N. Dak., spent last week here visiting with relatives and conducting four services.

A. L. Carlson left on Saturday for the Twin Cities where he is spending the week attending to business. He is accompanied by Arvid Carlson of Middle River.

Bonanza Farming in the '70's

A bonanza farm of 4,000 acres was being operated in southeastern Minnesota during the 1870's, according to the Faribault Republican for 1877 and 1878, a file of which is in the possession of the Minnesota Historical society. This farm was owned by the Tapi Farm company, composed of two Faribault men and one Canadian. The company employed 25 men, and used 30 teams and 13 self-binders.

In 1878 the company seeded 2,650 acres in wheat and 1,200 acres in oats. With 26 teams it was possible to seed 2,550 acres in 16 days. Because of the poor quality of the wheat that year 1,200 acres of the crop were left uncut and were burned in the hope that the weeds might be destroyed.

Tabernacle Program

Another Tabernacle program will be broadcast under the direction of Rev. R. E. Smith, from KFJM, Grand Forks, April 11 at 4 p. m.

Spring has finally decided to step in and put an end to the long and disagreeable winter we have had. It started with a big thaw on Tuesday, turning to rain late that night and lasting until in the afternoon on Wednesday.

It sure made a lot of water and all lowlands and ditches were filled to capacity. In looking around yesterday morning we were surprised to find half the water gone away.

Mrs. Fred Larson and son Ingvald made a business trip to Thief River on Tuesday.

ELECTRIC ENERGY DOOMS BIG CITIES

Redistribution of Industry Seen by Harper Leech.

New York.—Giant cities will grow no larger and will lose their present financial and industrial importance; industry will break up into smaller units and operate in what are now rural districts; the worker will receive a greater share of his employer's profits in order to maintain buying power; and the cost of killing a Chinaman will jump from about fifty dollars, the present level, to approximately $17,500, all in the comparatively near future, and because mankind has discarded human and animal energy based on food cultivation and substituted for it his newly discovered ability to convert solar energy into work, principally in the form of electric power. These are some of the predictions affecting the welfare of humanity made by Harper Leech, writer on economic subjects, in his new book "The Paradox of Plenty."

That "this is not a depression but a mishandling of the greatest era of plenty the world has ever known," is the thesis of Mr. Leech's book. "The plain fact is," he says in his preface, "that after thousands, perhaps millions, of years of living on the energy grudgingly tendered by the sun through annual harvests of crops, man suddenly became aware that the same sun had been storing energy for millions of years. He discovered in coal an energy store with millions of times the energy available from his own muscles. Nearly two hundred years later, he still thinks of 'scarcity' when there is no scarcity. And, failing to adjust his institutions and his financial mechanisms to the conditions of plenty, he has failed to realize the advantages of plenty.

Transformation of the United States.

The transformation of the United States into a new form of industrial society, through the interconnection of electric power and transmission of energy, has already started, according to Mr. Leech, and "is now proceeding as rapidly as the previous political and economic intergration of America by railroad construction."

Mr. Leech points to recent developments in the Carolinas as typical of what may be expected of the future industrialism of the United States in the wake of its constantly expanding use of electrical energy. "In the Piedmont region of the Carolinas," he writes, "the first quarter of the Twentieth century witnessed a repetition of the industrial revolution of the Eighteenth century in the north of England. There was the same shift from agriculture and cottage industries to factories, but no growth of cities to correspond to the growth of the steam-generated Babylons like Manchester, Leeds, Pittsburgh or Chicago, which gathered into themselves the great, constructive forces of the Nineteenth century.

"The new type of industrialism which is seen in most characteristic form in the Carolinas has been subjected to much criticism. But it brought to the inhabitants of those regions a far greater net gain of income and welfare than came to the people who lived through the great transitions from agriculture to factory life in regions of earlier industrial maturity. Whether urban critics like it or not—the Carolinas today are a prototype of the future industrialism of America.

The mammoth metropolises of the modern world already show signs of overgrowth and overspecialization, which in the organic world foretell the doom of a species.

"Because of the congestion in cities, there has been built up a complex system of distribution. There are brokers, jobbers, wholesalers, and warehouse men, all adding tremendously to the expense of transportation and handling.

"Superficially, the greater per capita consumption of electricity in cities would indicate higher living standards than in small communities with a lower per capita consumption, but much of the urban use of electricity goes merely to level up the city dweller's plane of life to that already enjoyed by the inhabitant of the smaller community without recourse to electrical or mechanical power."

Mr. Leech points out in his book that the vastly increased ability to produce agricultural and other products that electrical energy has placed in the hands of men has destroyed completely the promise that scarcity is a measure of value. With the energy now available, he says, it takes but a small proportion of the population to supply the essential needs of the whole nation.

Therefore, he adds, there can be no scarcity, and scarcity ceases to be a measure of value.

In conclusion Mr. Leech strikes a note of optimism for the future of the United States and its citizens, and for western civilization as a whole. "Slowly, he declares, "the force of economic and technical realities has been removing from the throat of western mankind, the dead hand of obsolete economic doctrine. The evidence is unmistakable that humanity can escape from the prison house of want; and, although still rubbing eyes blinded from long confinement in the dungeon, can now see a new world. With famine vanquished and other forms of privation being rapidly diminished, old faiths born of want and fear have been losing force."

Colorado's Sand Dunes Attract Many Tourists

Alamoso, Colo.—Colorado's sand dunes, unique wonders of nature in a land that knows more of rock than sand, are attracting thousands of tourists and westerners by their beauty.

The great rolling hills of sand, swept smooth by the winds, have become a pleasure spot.

Where an inland sea once rolled, the big dunes now attract skiers. So smooth is the sand that skis can be used on the hills as though they were snow.

Unheralded for years, the scenic beauties of the dunes have been broadcast recently and they have shown promise of rivaling as an attraction the mountains of rock that have made Colorado famous.

PILOTS OFFER TO FIGHT FOR CHINA

Americans and Canadians Seek Foreign Service.

Ottawa, Ont.—American and Canadian air fighters, some of them with twenty and thirty machines to their credit in the great war, may soon be zooming through Asiatic skies helping the Chinese to throw back the Japanese forces.

Since eighty experienced Royal Canadian air force pilots offered their services in a body through Chinese consul general for Canada, Tchuin Li, a number of American air pilots have expressed desires to join them. One of the American even offers to pay his own way to China. Recently Mr. Li received from the Chinese Nationalist government at Nanking a cablegram indicating that there is a probability of their enlistment offers being accepted.

The cablegram received by the Chinese consul general is in response to his cabled report of the enlistment offer of the experienced Canadian flyers. It says that the Chinese government's aviation department finds the proposal "interesting" and welcomes the idea of having experienced aviators from the Occident fight under the Chinese Nationalist flag.

It will be necessary, however, the cablegram states, for the Chinese aviation department to give full consideration to the detailed report of the proposals, now in the mails on its way to China, before definite answer can be given. According to the Canadian air force spokesman, who, because of Canadian government opposition to the move cannot reveal his identity, the Canadian proposals should reach Nanking about the middle of March.

"We are planning our organization," he said, "so that we can start immediately upon receipt of favorable definite reply from the Chinese government."

The Canadians say they are prepared to equip and man two squadrons, one pursuit and one bombing, at a cost to the Chinese government for the first year of nine million dollars, including maintenance and salaries. Each succeeding year would cost but four millions. If necessary the airmen say they can equip two or more squadrons of eighteen machines each. There are about 400 pilots and mechanics affected by the Royal Canadian air force layoff.

Whale Tows Smack, Tears Off Anchor

Cape May, N. J.—Capt. Esse Boles, master of the Sea Toy, a fishing smack that sails out of this harbor, returned to port, reporting he had run into a school of whales, and that one of them had yanked the anchor off his boat. According to Captain Boles, who is a teetotaler and a member of the Methodist church, he dropped anchor off Chincoteague, Va., in search of codfish, but his anchor caught in the stomach of a whale, apparently annoying the leviathan intensely.

The big sea mammal dragged his smack back and forth, Captain Boles declares, until he was almost ready to cut the anchor cable. Then the whale jerked the anchor loose and spared him the trouble.

Sidewalk Repairs Give Work to Unemployed Men

Chicago.—Fixing up sidewalks seems to be a popular means of providing emergency employment, according to information received from various sections of the country. Cleveland, Ohio, has kept an extra force of from 200 to 500 men at work during the past few months, replacing damaged sections of sidewalk throughout the city.

Other reports of similar projects have come from many other communities.

Various means of financing the repairs have been reported. In Macomb, Ill., men repairing walks are paid by the local unemployment bureau, and the only cost to the city is for materials and supervision. Under this plan jobless men "work out" what they get from funds donated for unemployment relief, and the city as a whole receives the benefit.

Construction Bargains Seen in Lowered Costs

Chicago.—That construction bargains abound for people who will take advantage of them and build this year, is indicated by prices on contracts recently awarded. A good example is the concrete wading pool for which a contract has just been let in Oak Park, Ill., at a cost of only $1,000.

Two pools of similar design which Oak Park built in 1929 cost the community $2,400 each. In 1931, the price had dropped to $1,450 each for two more wading pools installed. But the 1932 low bid was more than 80 per cent under the successful bid in 1931.

"FATIGUE? I just postpone it!"

"No, I don't have 'nerves.' You can't have them, and hold this sort of position. My head used to throb around three o'clock, and certain days, of course, were worse than others.

"Then I learned to rely on Bayer Aspirin."

The sure cure for any headache is rest. But sometimes we must postpone it. That's when Bayer Aspirin saves the day. Two tablets, and the nagging pain is gone until you are home. And once you are comfortable, the pain seldom returns!

Keep Bayer Aspirin handy. Don't put it away, or put off taking it. Fighting a headache to finish the day may be heroic, but it is also a little foolish. So is sacrificing a night's sleep because you've an annoying cold, or irritated throat, or grumbling tooth, neuralgia, neuritis. These tablets always relieve. They don't depress the heart, and may be taken freely. That is medical opinion. It is a fact established by the last twenty years of medical practice.

The only caution to be observed is when you are buying aspirin. Bayer is genuine. Tablets with the Bayer cross are safe.

Precepts of Franklin Should Be Remembered

The proposed $5,000,000 Philadelphia memorial to Benjamin Franklin should have some place in it calling attention to that American's 13 suggested virtues and precepts, on which the club of Washington and Sioux City, Iowa, patterned after the Junket club of Franklin's day, are founded, says the Pathfinder Magazine. They are:

"Eat not to dullness, drink not to elevation. Speak not but what may benefit others or yourself, avoid trifling conversation. Let all your things have their places; let each part of your business have its time. Resolve to perform what you ought, perform without fail what you resolve. Make no expense but to do good to others or yourself, i. e., waste nothing. Lose no time; be always employed in something useful; cut off all unnecessary actions. Use no hurtful deceit, think innocently and justly and, if you speak, speak accordingly. Wrong none by doing injuries, or omitting the benefits that are your duty. Avoid extremes; forbear resenting injuries so much as you think they deserve. Tolerate no uncleanliness in body, clothes or habitation. Be not disturbed at trifles, or at accidents, common or unavoidable. Be chaste. Imitate Jesus and Socrates."

Lost 20 Lbs. of Fat In Just 4 Weeks

Mrs. Mae West of St. Louis, Mo., writes: "I'm only 28 yrs. old and weighed 170 lbs. until taking one box of your Kruschen Salts just 4 weeks ago. I now weigh 150 lbs. I also have more energy and furthermore I've never had a hungry moment."

Fat folks should take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water in the morning before breakfast—it's the SAFE, harmless way to reduce as tens of thousands of men and women know.

For your health's sake ask for and get Kruschen at any drugstore—the cost for a bottle that lasts 4 weeks is but a trifle and if after the first bottle you are not joyfully satisfied with results—money back.

Iron Roads for England

A number of cast-iron roads are to be laid in England, following successfull experiments with short sections. The advantages of such roads are said to be that they are guaranteed to wear about twice as well as stone and three times as well as wood; that the short projections on the surface of the metal prevent skidding, and that British iron can be used instead of foreign materials.

The cost of building iron roads is reported to be the same as for the best wooden paving. The metal is laid not in long sheets, but by putting triangular castings on a cement base.

Novels Dangerous Gifts

Professor Rogers of Massachusetts Tech thinks that it is extremely hazardous to give anyone a popular novel as a present.

"No one can possibly tell what may impress 'Great Aunt Elsie' as a suitable title," he explains. "I, myself, when but ten years old, received a copy of 'Under Two Flags' from a relative who had the idea that the book would give me a truthful and interesting picture of the Civil war. It was many years before I was allowed to read the book."—Boston Globe.

COMFORT for COLICKY BABIES

. . . THROUGH CASTORIA'S GENTLE REGULATION

The best way to prevent colic, doctors say, is to avoid gas in stomach and bowels by keeping the entire intestinal tract open, free from waste. But remember this: a tiny baby's tender little organs cannot stand harsh treatment. They must be gently urged. This is just the time Castoria can help most. Castoria, you know, is made specially for babies and children. It is a pure vegetable preparation, perfectly harmless. It contains no harsh drugs, no narcotics. For years it has helped mothers through trying times with colicky babies and children suffering with digestive upsets, colds and fever. Keep genuine Castoria on hand, with the name:

SYNOPSIS

In concern over the disappearance of the young and beautiful wife of his wealthy friend, Crandall White, Aaron Glaenzer engages Motherwell, private investigator to find her. A note from the missing woman warns her husband not to call in the police, saying she "hoped to come back." Mrs White is younger than her husband, and his devotion has been the talk of New York. Her leaving him is unexplainable. She is known to have with her a remarkable jewel, the "Medusa's Head," but her maid, Coggeshall, thinks she had little else of value. Glaenzer and Motherwell have a talk with Coggeshall, without material results.

At this moment Mr. Glaenzer hurried back into the room.

"I'm leaving immediately for Atlantic City," he said briefly. "Mr. White's got a bronchitis out of this, I'm afraid. Coggeshall, this is Mr. Wells, one of my young men. As soon as the safe is opened, he will list the various pieces and give you a receipt for them. Take them directly to Lilienthal, the head of the repairs, you know, Wells, and be sure to get your receipt from him."

"Very good, sir," said the young man, "and there are some things I'd like to ask you about—"

In the hall he spoke low and quickly.

"It can't be helped, Mr. Glaenzer. It's just as I felt from the beginning—I must have it out with the maid."

"You really feel—"

"There's no one else, Mr. Glaenzer! Why, nobody even knows where she started for! Why should she have taken a taxi and not her own car, for instance?"

Mr. Glaenzer sighed.

"This woman says that she was dressed as if for 'walking on a rainy day in the country,'" the young man went on, "and Wednesday was a perfectly clear day. No, Mr. Glaenzer, I must have some help. And I think she's the woman to help me."

Mr. Glaenzer shrugged one expressive shoulder.

"Very well, my dear young man—whatever you say!" he murmured. "We can't keep this up, you know, very long. A few days, perhaps—Personally, I should have long ago—Well, no, I can't say that. But I doubt if my poor friend's scruples—At any rate, use your own judgment—and that flair, that flair!" he repeated with almost a smile.

In Mrs. White's sea-green and ivory bedroom a swarthy, squat little man was kneeling beside a safe in the wall, when Mr. Wells returned. Coggeshall stood on guard behind him.

"Pretty tough nut, eh?" suggested Mr. Wells, watching him with interest.

The swarthy one sniffed scornfully. "Not much!" he answered. "There she goes!"

As the door swung open, he picked up his bunches of keys and file, and swept them into a shapeless bag.

"Hardly what I'd call a job" he said. And he scuttled out.

The woman sighed.

"I expect you'll want them out of the cases?" she said. "Have you a bag with you?"

"They would take up less room," he agreed.

She moved, without a word, to a closet, and produced a leather bag.

"Put them in here," she said briefly, and taking out a monogrammed morocco case, she pressed its spring.

"These are the small pearls—" she began, but the box was empty.

Muttering something about an emerald pendant, she pulled out an exquisite green case, with tooled edges. But this also was empty. Under his keen eyes she turned out every one of the cases and small drawers in the safe, but there was nothing in any of them. Her face was as white as their velvet linings.

But Mr. Wells was quite unconcerned.

"Now, what do you think of that?" he said lightly. "She took them with her, after all! Good joke on us, what?"

She stared at him a moment, and then dropped her head into her hands and wept. He waited in silence while you could have counted five, and then twitched her hands away suddenly.

"Where'd she go?" he asked. "Where?"

"I don't know!" the woman sobbed, instinctively altering her manner, even through her tears, to something new in his tone. "They won't any of them tell me, sir!"

He searched her pale gray eyes, but they hardly wavered under his. And yet—and yet—there was something—he could swear there was something—

"Sit up," he said abruptly, "and listen to me. They don't tell you, Coggeshall, because they don't know. That's why. Nobody knows. And we've got to find out."

It was quite clear to him that although she was not entirely unprepared for some disagreeable news of her mistress, she was honestly ignorant of her whereabouts.

"But what's happened to her, sir? What's happened to her? Where would she go? And why couldn't she send us word? You mean there's been no word at all?"

He looked her straight in the eye.

"Yes, there has," he said, "but it doesn't do us much good. She will come back, if she can, she says, but not if the police are notified. She swears she means it. If you have any idea, Coggeshall, the remotest ghost of an idea, as to where she might have gone, and could get any word to her, now's your chance to help her."

She looked drearily back at him.

"Yes, sir. But I haven't," she said.

He scowled.

"All right," he said shortly.

"Now, these jewels. She's got them, of course. Took them with her, undoubtedly."

"No, sir," said the maid definitely, "she didn't do that, sir. That I know. I went straight down to the front door with her, and all she had was her beaded bag on her wrist and a square box with the big onyx paperweight that broke, that I'd done up myself, the evening before. She was to take it to the jeweler's herself, and talk it over. I knew the package, for I'd tied it myself."

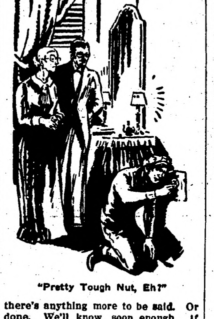
"Then she had them on her, somewhere."

"On her?" the maid repeated scornfully. "Will you tell me where, sir? The way the ladies dress nowadays, where would you put what came out of these boxes? Bunched out like that, indeed!"

"Couldn't you sew them in?" he began, but she cut him short.

"I tell you I dressed her!" she cried, and he gave way.

"Well, anyhow—" he said. "Now see here. Either she wanted to run away, or she didn't. If she wanted to—well, that's that. I don't see that there's anything more to be said. Or done. We'll know, soon enough. If she didn't (which I believe) then she wants to get back. And if she didn't want to come back, why did she write that way? Why not just go?"



"Pretty Tough Nut, Eh?"

"What way, sir?"

"She said, 'I hope to come back' and 'I must leave you for a little,' but she also said that she was frightened to death," said Mr. Wells, slowly.

"'Frightened to death!'" the woman repeated, "'frightened to death!' Oh, dear me! Dear me! And poor Mr. White on the flat of his back! But if she said she'd come back sir—"

"That's all very well," said the young man, "but suppose she can't? She said she hoped to come back. That's a little different, you see. There may be some funny business here, you know. When I thought she had no jewels, I felt very different about it. But with all that junk on her—well, she must have known all that, when she wrote."

He swung to the safe door, having tumbled the boxes back in it.

"Now, where was she going on Wednesday?" he asked. "Was she upset at all?"

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Origin of Famous Saying

"When Greeks joined Greeks, then was the tug of war," is from the fourth act of a tragedy in blank verse entitled "The Rival Queens, or the Death of Alexander the Great," and written in 1677 by Nathaniel Lee, an English dramatist, says Pathfinder Magazine. This play made the author's reputation and remained a favorite on the English stage until the time of Edmund Kean. The line in question refers to the stubborn resistance made by the Greek cities to the armies of Philip of Macedon and his son, Alexander the Great. "When Greek meets Greek" now is employed to suggest that when two courageous men or armies fight the contest is likely to be a severe one.

Pioneers Planted Many Trees

Pioneer farmers who settled the prairies of the Middle West were great tree planters, according to the United States forest service. Most of them came from districts in the East where they had been clearing lands for agriculture, but in the new environment of the plains they quickly saw the need of planting trees for shelter against winter cold and summer heat. The plantings also supplied fuel, wood, poles, posts, and rough timbers.

It is estimated that farmers planted about 240,000 acres of trees in Iowa, 40,000 in Illinois, 14,000 in Ohio, 100,00 in Missouri, and lesser acreages in other central states where there were more native forests.

KEEP GRIM RELIC OF BAD OLD DAYS

Ancient English Prison Dungeon Preserved.

A grim relic of the past, the old prison house dungeon is being preserved presumably as a reminder of "the bad old days," among the structural alterations and big blocks of new buildings now in course of erection for the housing of the various Warwickshire (England) county council staffs at the rear of the Shire hall, Warwick.

The dungeon was linked up with the Assize Courts, by a low, narrow passage. This has been demolished, but the entrance to the dungeon, which is by way of a flight of stone steps, and the dungeon itself, are being kept intact.

This dark place is a veritable "black hole," circular in construction, with a small iron grill in the roof (which is at the ground level) as the only means of light and air. Although it is only about 20 feet in diameter and 16 feet high, it is said that as many as 60 people were cast into it at a time.

On the floor of the dungeon is a circle of thick stakes which it is thought held a main chain from which smaller chains were connected to the prisoners.

The dungeon was constructed in 1680 by order of the Epiphany Court of Quarter Sessions. After its construction much trouble was experienced owing to constant flooding of the dungeon, and subsequently it was discovered that it had been built over a spring. The flooding was eventually dealt with by the construction of a central cesspit. The dungeon was used principally for the imprisonment of Quakers, Anabaptists and other unorthodox religious sects. It ceased to be used in 1797.

The site of the new offices is the place where the old house of correction and the county jail stood at one time, and on the outer wall in Barrack street is an archway under which public executions took place. The archway is being preserved, though it has been built in. The rings are still to be seen in the wall, which were used to fasten chains across the street in order to keep the crowd from thronging the scaffold. During the alterations the remains of two skeletons were unearthed, and these were presumed to be those of prisoners who had been hanged.

British Empire the "Tea Garden of the World"

Today it may be said with truth that the British empire is a tea garden and the world's tea shop. South Africa, Nyassaland and Kenya have followed India and only one rival remains of any consequence—Java and Sumatra.

As to China, the darker, less aromatic tea of India captured the western world and slowly but surely ousted the paler drink, beer. In 40 years China's tea exports have nearly halved. The figures speak. In 1901 India produced 201,000,000 pounds. In 1921, 274,000,000 pounds. In 1928, 404,000,000 pounds. Ceylon, too, had increased its output from 144,000,000 pounds to 251,000,000 pounds.

The tea plant throws up young and tender leaves from the top—the so-called "flush." It is from these that tea is made.

All these tender shoots have to be removed by hand. Many attempts have been made to harvest this delicate crop by machinery; all have failed. Before the crop is shipped away it is subjected to an intricate process of withering, rolling, fermenting, firing, sorting and packing.

In a narrow by-street off Mincing lane a man sits beside a steaming kettle, a watch in his hand. A china teapot stands beside him and on the table an array of tea samples. Very carefully he times the kettle, infuses the tea, waits four minutes by his watch and then takes it in his mouth.

This is the tea-taster. He tests its qualities by the taste buds of his tongue and then ejects it. In this way teas are graded and valued for the market.

Newspapers Best Now

Sir Kingley Wood, postmaster general of England, who has charge of the government-owned telegraph and telephone systems, is launching a campaign for more telephone subscribers. He has chosen newspapers to carry the advertising messages, he told the Lewisham Chamber of Commerce at its annual dinner. He said that although times were difficult and all had of necessity to husband their resources, he believed that newspaper advertising should be utilized today as one of the best means of attracting new customers and maintaining old ones.

Weak, Rundown During Middle Life

Janesville, Wis. — "Some time ago I became weak and rundown in health. It was about the time of middle age and someone suggested that I try Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription," said Mrs. Mertie Streeter, 312 Dodge St. "I did so, and by the time I had taken four bottles I was perfectly well. I had tried a number of other medicines but the 'Prescription' was the only thing that benefited me."

Reviving Use of Gaelic

At present about 1 per cent of the population of Ireland speaks Gaelic only; 86 per cent English only; and about 13 per cent both languages. Since the establishment of the Irish Free State, Irish is being taught in schools, with the idea of the eventual restoration of Irish as the vernacular of the country.

STOP THAT COLD

DISTRESSING cold in chest or throat—that so often leads to something serious—generally responds to good old Musterole with the first application. Should be more effective if used once every hour for five hours. This famous blend of oil of mustard, camphor, menthol and other helpful ingredients brings relief naturally. Musterole gets action because it is a scientific "counter-irritant"—not just a salve—it penetrates and stimulates blood circulation, helps to draw out infection and pain. Used by millions for 20 years. Recommended by doctors and nurses.

To Mothers—Musterole is also made in milder form for babies and small children. Ask for Children's Musterole.

Food for thought

MEN and women find that those recurrent spring colds reduce their alertness of mind and body. To avoid such nuisances, doctors advise them to increase their bodies' store of Vitamin A. It is recognized that Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil contains a wealth of this valuable protective vitamin . . . as well as Vitamin D, so indispensable for sound bones and teeth. Children and adults find the emulsion an easy, pleasant way of taking cod liver oil. Scott & Bowne, Bloomfield, N. J. Sales Representative, Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Inc., New York.

A KITCHEN SHOWER

WHOEVER originally remarked that "it never rains but it pours" must have had in mind those showers for engaged girls which pour a lot of useless trifles for which the restricted space of love-in-a-cottage is pressed to provide room. When there are so many things a bride is going to really need, and especially now when we are just coming out of the depression period, why, oh why, give brides an over-abundance of chiffon handkerchiefs and bon-bon dishes?

Do we brand ourselves as prosaic, utilitarian and thoroughly unromantic when we suggest a kitchen shower? There are two alibis: one that the bride's kitchen should rightfully be one of the most enchanting nooks in the whole house; and two, that the kitchen, since it is all dressed up, has stepped into the social whirls to the extent that kitchen parties are now quite the thing.

Towels, Aprons and Tins

A kitchen shower may include pretty peasant linens for the kitchen and dinette, for tea-towels, for curtains and other uses; tiny pots of growing kitchen plants—mint, parsley and chives. But such a shower should concentrate on tin—foods in tin cans, shining new kitchen utensils of tin and the various other mediums.

And since the guest of honor may be very uninitiated into the charms of the kitchen, the shower might well take place there. Let one of the guests disguise as a woman peddler who comes to the kitchen door with a pack on her back. The hostess may answer her knock and then invite the guests in to see her wares. Have a table available so that the interesting gifts may be arrayed there, and when the peddler places the last gift on the table it appears bedecked in bows and streamers of white satin ribbon. The peddler then removes her shawls and disguise, and the secret is out.

Canned Food Delicacies

The canned foods should include a plentiful assortment of delicacies which the bride will delight to use for her own entertaining. Such things as canned fish for cocktails—shrimp, crabmeat, oysters and clams; delicious fruits which include choice cherries, figs, grapefruit hearts, loganberries, pineapple and strawberries; interesting imported cans of cheese, mushrooms, sardines, anchovies and similar delicacies for hors d'oeuvres and canapés; soups, such as chicken broth, consommé, green pea, crab gumbo, cream of asparagus; and unusual vegetables such as the Chinese sprouts and bamboo shoots for chop suey, artichokes, baby lima beans, tender rhubarb and Brussels sprouts, as well as the usual vegetables. And, by all means include some canned nuts, candies, and other sweetmeats.

If you like to have your whole entertainment in keeping, serve a canned food luncheon or refreshment menu. Here is a menu suggestion with tested recipes:

Rolled Celery and Pimiento Sandwiches
Heart Cheese Sandwiches
Cocoanut Cherry Macaroons
Iced Cup Cakes
Honeymoon Punch Tea
Mints Salted Nuts

Rolled Celery and Pimiento Sandwiches: Cut crusts off a very fresh loaf of bread and cut in thin slices. Cover with a wet cloth for at least an hour. Butter. Mix very finely diced celery with sufficient mayonnaise to moisten; season to taste and spread on bread. Place a long piece of canned pimiento across the center of the slice, then roll tightly together, with the red pimiento showing at each end, and tie with a narrow white ribbon.

Cocoanut Cherry Macaroons: Beat the whites of four eggs until stiff but not too dry. Fold in one cup of confectioner's sugar, one-half cup of candied cherries and one cup of moist cocoanut. Drop by spoonfuls on ungreased brown paper and decorate the tops with red cherries. Bake in a slow oven, 250° for forty-five minutes.

Honeymoon Punch: Simmer two cups water and three tablespoons sugar for a few minutes, then add the juice from two No. 2 cans of red pitted cherries and the syrup from two No. 2½ cans of sliced pineapple, and four tablespoons of lemon juice. Chill and serve with a marshmallow floating in each glass.*

The Farm Situation

It is difficult to find anything cheerful to say about the farm situation, unless it be by comparison with the industrial situation in the cities. It is in times like these that the value of the farm home, with a winter's vegetables in the cellar and the cows and chickens as faithful standbys, is fully appreciated. The prices of farm products have fallen much more than the prices of what the farmer buys, but on account of his own supply of prime necessaries he is able, if not in debt, to stand the storm more comfortably than might seem possible in view of his reduced income from outside.

According to a Department of Agriculture calculation, the average price of all farm products in the Uuited States on January 15, 1932, was only 63 per cent of the average over the last five prewar years, while a similar calculation of the prices of goods which farmers are accustomed to buy was 121 per cent. On this basis the farmers as a group are able to make only 51 per cent of the purchases which they were accustomed to make in the prewar years.

That single statement accounts for a large part of the unemployment in the other industries. What has happened to the farmers has happened also to the people who live in the small towns immediately dependent upon the farms, and to these have been gradually added the numbers of unemployed in all the industries, as the decrease in buying power has spread. The farmer is digging in to survive, and he has some advantage over other people digging in, but through no fault of his own he cannot give much support to the other industries. He is delivering about the same quantities of his products as formerly, but receiving only about one-half as much in exchange. Nominally the other industries have an advantage, their products are rated relatively higher than before the war but they are not more prosperous. Never has there been a clearer demonstration that the basis of prosperity is equitable exchange relations. It is hardly necessary to say that the existing situation is not what it is by design, but the unforseen result of the violent readjustments forced upon industry by the war.

Telephone Meeting Held

The following officers were re-elected at the annual meeting of the Farmers & Village Switchboard Company on Monday of last week: Aug. Nass, president; Fred Steinhauer, director; John Sorum, director and manager; T. B. Folden, sec'y-treas.

Several matters of important business were ironed out and the affairs of the company were found to be in pretty good shape.

Patrons should show their appreciation of the telephone service by paying up their dues regularly and not do so much rubbernecking as soon as they hear a call on the line.

County Assessors To Meet

A meeting of the county assessors of Marshall county will be held at Warren on Tuesday, April 19, for the purpose of giving instructions to assessors. This meeting will be open to the public, so that all those interested may attend.

Eagle Made Much Trouble

When power trouble resulted between Dodge City, Kan., and Bucklin, investigators found a large eagle had fallen on the wires and caused a short circuit. The bird measured six feet between wing tips and had a rabbit in its claws. It was a white-headed eagle, rarely ever seen in this section of the country.

"I CUT MY SMOKING COST IN HALF AND DOUBLED MY PLEASURE!!!"

THAT'S a strong statement. But it's true. And Target Cigarette Tobacco is the answer.

"I first started on Target to save money. I heard you could roll thirty or more cigarettes for a dime with Target. But that isn't all.

"Target gives you the same taste you get in the best ready-mades. And with those special gummed papers you get free with every package, you sure can roll plump, sweet smokes. I sure do get twice the pleasure and, of course, no one objects to saving fifty cents a week.

"I advise you to try Target, and enjoy the blend of Virginia, Burley and Turkish tobaccos just like in ready-mades."

AND GET THIS: The U. S. Government Tax on 20 cigarettes amounts to 6¢. On 20 cigarettes you roll from Target Tobacco the tax is just about 1¢. No wonder you get such value for a dime!

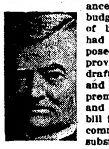
Speaker Garner in Dramatic Speech Quells House Sales Tax Rebels—Substitute for Defeated Sales Tax Is Quickly Passed.

SPEAKER JOHN N. GARNER quelled the house of representative tax rebels and assured the nation of tax legislation that would balance the national budget. The members of both parties who had successfully opposed the sales tax provisions of the bill drafted by the ways and means committee promised to be good and support the new bill introduced by the committee and as a substitute for the sales tax that had been defeated.



Speaker Garner

It all came about when the speaker took the floor and delivered a speech that was a combination of tempered argument, impassioned plea and camp-meeting exhortation. As he whirled into his peroration, an exalted house membership answered his appeal for those resolved to lead a new life to arise. En masse the congressmen surged to their feet and took the pledge to pass a tax measure that will balance the budget.

Then the house settled down to business. The ways and means committee introduced its list of new taxes to take the place of the defeated sales tax, and the various items were approved so rapidly that Acting Chairman Crisp had to stop the offering of items in order to give the engrossing clerks time to draw the various amendments.

The new levies as provided for in the house bill covers taxes on the following articles with the estimated revenue:

INCOME TAXES	REVENUE
Individual (increases carried in bill)	$ 112,000,000
Increase in normal rate	8,000,000
Increase in surtaxes (wartime rates)	17,000,000
Lowering surtax exemption from $10,000 to $6,000	7,000,000
Corporate tax (12 to 13 as carried in bill)	21,000,000
Corporate tax (13 to 13½ per cent)	5,000,000
Corporate tax (15 per cent on consolidated and affiliated returns)	18,000,000
Corporate exemptions (lowered $2,000 to $1,000)	6,000,000
Net loss deduction disallowed 1931-1933 (preventing carryover of losses)	20,000,000
Administrative changes	100,000,000
Gift tax	20,000,000
Estate tax	20,000,000
Dividends (Sec. 115-B: removing tax exempt corporate stock)	[illegible]
Dividends (Sec. 115-D: removing tax exempt corporate stock)	2,000,000
Lubricating oil (4 cents a gallon)	35,000,000
Imported petroleum (1 cent a gallon)	25,000,000
Malt, wort, grape concentrates, etc.	46,000,000
Imported coal	1,500,000

Jewelry (10 per cent)	15,000,000
Beverages (restoration of 1921 rates)	11,000,000
Matches (4 cents per 1,000)	11,000,000
Radios, phonographs (5 per cent)	11,000,000
Automobiles (3 per cent); trucks (2 per cent); accessories (1 per cent)	57,000,000
Sporting goods and cameras (10 per cent)	4,000,000
Chewing gum (5 per cent)	3,000,000
Candy (5 per cent)	12,000,000
Mechanical refrigerators (5 per cent)	4,500,000
Yachts, motorboats, etc. (10 per cent above $15 in value)	500,000
MISCELLANEOUS
Sale of stocks (⅛ per cent, but not less than 4 cents a share)	75,000,000
Bonds, transfers of (1-28 of 1 per cent)	13,000,000
Conveyances (restoration of war-time rates)	10,000,000
Sales of produce on exchanges (5 cents per $100)	6,000,000
Pipe line (15 per cent of carrying charges)	15,000,000
Airplane (5 per cent on manufacturer's price)	2,000,000
Total	$ 984,500,000
Amount of savings expected on appropriations	243,000,000
Amount of expected savings in postal service	30,000,000
Grand total	$1,257,500,000
Anticipated deficit 1933	$1,241,000,000
Surplus (with proposed new savings)	$ 16,500,000

The house bill provides for the payment of the levied excise and sales taxes by the manufacturer direct to the government, with the method of collecting the taxes about the same as under the general manufacturers' sales tax which was rejected. That does not mean, however, that the tax will not be passed along in the form of an increased price for the merchandise, and there is nothing in the bill that would prevent the manufacturer from directly including the tax item in his invoice to the jobber or retailer and so on down the line until it reaches the consumer.

The fact that the house has passed a revenue bill does not mean that this bill is to be the law of the land. It is almost certain that the senate will not agree. The senate committee is very likely to substitute for the new provisions of the house bill the manufacturers' sales tax that was rejected by the house, and pass the revenue bill in that form. Should it do so it will mean another fight in the house, then a long conference consideration, and there is no prospect for an early adjournment of congress. Experienced members of both houses are now predicting that there will not be an agreement over a revenue bill earlier than September.

THE Hoover budget will be slashed a quarter of a billion dollars if the house accepts the recommendations already made and to be made by its appropriations and economy committees, Chairman Joseph W. Byrns (Dem., Tenn.) of the house appropriations committee asserted.

Just prior to announcing his resignation, on a plea of overwork, from the chairmanship of the special economy committee, Mr. Byrns said that body will submit recommendations calling for consolidations and economies totalling at least $75,000,000 and possibly a sum two or three times that figure.

Chairman Byrns said that hearings thus far conducted by the various committees handling governmental supply bills disclosed that at least $150,000,000 could be shaved off the budget figures submitted by President Hoover without in any way impairing the efficiency of the government. The committees plan to slash an additional $30,000,000 from national defense appropriations, Mr. Byrns said.

NORMAN DAVIS, one of the American delegates to the Geneva arms conference, arrived in Washington and went into a series of conferences with State department executives. Although officials declined to make public the nature of the discussions it was learned that Mr. Davis outlined the obstacles which have been encountered in the move to work out a general arms limitation treaty and reported to the department on the plan of action for the future outlined by himself and his associates. As matters now stand, many pressing European problems must be settled before there is the remotest chance for the negotiation of a treaty which carries reductions in land forces.

Norman Davis

PRESIDENT HOOVER announced formally at the regular press conference that he is "absolutely opposed to the enactment by congress of additional soldiers' bonus legislation, and indicated that he would veto such a bill if passed. The President's statement follows:

"Informal polls of the house of representatives have created apprehension in the country that a further bonus bill of $2,000,000,000 or thereabouts for World war veterans will be passed.

"I wish to state again that I am absolutely opposed to any such legislation.

"I made this position clear at the meeting of the American Legion in Detroit last September 21, and the Legion has consistently supported that position. I do not believe any such legislation can become law.

"Such action would undo every effort that is being made to reduce government expenditures and balance the budget.

"The first duty of every citizen of the United States is to build up and sustain the credit of the United States government.

"Such an action would irretrievably undermine it."

SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE Arthur M. Hyde called his department the "prize boob in the history of finance," because of its policy of making virtually unsecured loans to farmers in the face of rapidly mounting crop surpluses.

"Under present conditions," Secretary Hyde said "my department is now lending more money on thinner security and sustaining more losses than any organization ever has done before in the history of the world. Loans now being made by my department to small farmers who otherwise could not finance themselves could not by the furthest stretch of the imagination be called good business."

The Hyde statement was directed at the farm loan policy under which the Agriculture department makes loans to small farmers for economic reasons. He asserted that the government should not go into the business of making loans to farmers except in cases of drought, or floods or calamities growing out of natural causes. The current type of loans are unjustifiable, he said.

WASHINGTON crime is again brought into the limelight as police attempt to locate extortionists who have threatened harm to the children of three prominent Washington families.

Alice Longworth

Mrs. Betty Hanna Davidson, granddaughter of Mark Hanna, demanded police protection following receipt of a telephone call threatening injury to her daughter Daisy, six years old, unless $2,000 was paid.

This threat followed shortly upon the disclosure that threatening letters had been received by Mrs. Alice Longworth, widow of the former speaker, and Sir Wilmott Lewis, Washington correspondent for a London newspaper. The letters threatened harm to Paulina Longworth, seven years old and probably the best known child, next to the Lindbergh baby, in the United States, and to Wilmott Lewis, Jr., five years old.

WITH a vigorous denunciation of the "disease of overtaxation," business leaders of the Middle West, at a meeting in Chicago, joined in a protest against excessive appropriations by congress. Federal waste and extravagance were bitterly attacked.

Some fifty representatives of cities in 17 states attended the meeting which was called by the Chicago Association of Commerce. A resolution was adopted which called upon congress to recognize the emergency in national affairs and to avoid taking any steps which might jeopardize the credit of the government. A number of speakers declared that the business and commerce of the nation could not recover unless a balanced federal budget is adopted.

A RECOMMENDATION against development of the navigation and irrigation phases of the $772,000,000 Columbia river development project at this time was included in a report submitted to the secretary of war for transmission to congress by Maj. Gen. Lytle Brown, chief of engineers.

While recommending that the sum of $16,000,000 should be expended by the government for the construction of locks and other aids to navigation in the Columbia river when private or state interests are ready to develop water power, Major General Brown took the position that the time was not ripe for the spending of any considerable amount of federal money on this huge project.

THE Missouri Democratic state convention at St. Louis instructed its 54 delegates to the national convention to vote for former United States Senator James A. Reed as long as he has a chance to secure the nomination for President. Missouri's delegation will have 36 votes. Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt is the second choice of the instructed delegation.

Governor Roosevelt is the choice of the Iowa Democratic convention. The 26 delegates were instructed to "use all honorable means" to bring about his nomination.

STILL hale and hearty, Maj. Gen. Adolphus W. Greely celebrated his eighty-eighth birthday anniversary in Washington. His friend, Brig. Gen. Davis L. Brainard, chatted with him, recalling memories of the Arctic tragedy that shocked the world 48 years ago. Together they had laid on the ice of Cape Sabine in 1884 within whispering distance of the icy death that claimed 18 of the party of 25. Brainard was his top sergeant. They are the only survivors of the seven who were taken from the cape June 23, 1884, after ten months of privation and suffering, during which Greely, then a lieutenant, observed his fortieth anniversary.

A TREATY between the United States and Canada for the construction of the St. Lawrence waterway may be ready for signature soon. William D. Herridge, Canadian minister, is now ready to negotiate. It only remains to secure the consent of the respective governments. Then the treaty will be written.

Interesting Items —of— NORTH DAKOTA

Napoleon.—A fourteen-year-old boy, who has been missing from home for four months, is the object of a search being conducted by county officers and school officials.

Mandan.—Carl Bentz, living west of Sunny, claimed the first wheat seeding honors for Morton county when he seeded an acre of wheat on his farm last week.

Fessenden.—Disputing the right of way with an automobile, a mule owned by Clifford Grimes was so badly injured that it died. Occupants of the auto suffered minor cuts and bruises.

Cooperstown.—Presidents of the 31 Luther leagues comprising the Cooperstown circuit, met here Saturday for the purpose of discussing league activities and completing plans for the circuit convention at Buffalo.

Cooperstown.—Reduction in salaries and other economies in the local school system, will reduce the operating cost for the school year of 1932-1933 to $5,000 less than what it cost in 1928.

Finley.—Finley's crow and gopher hunting contest has started, with old crows bringing five credits to the shooter, young crows three credits, and one credit each for crow's eggs and gophers.

Carrington.—The 20th annual benefit dinner for the Carrington cemetery association was held last week to raise money to pay the caretakers' wages and defray other cemetery expenses.

Hankinson.—While engaged in a friendly boxing match, Harold McGray sustained a double fracture of the left leg when he fell in such a manner as to break two bones above the ankle.

Hunter.—O. I. Grotte, Hunter, has been granted a U. S. patent on a new hasp which eliminates the play between the hasp plate and the keeper, thus preventing the door from swinging slightly ajar and creating a draft.

LaMoure.—Marriages in LaMoure county for the year 1931 took a slight increase over the previous year while births took a drop of 28 less than in 1930. It is hoped, however, that the increase in marriages may have some bearing on the birth rate for 1932.

Kenmare.—The Brorson high school, located northeast of Kenmare, which has been vacant for a number of years, has been remodeled by citizens and converted into one large room which will be used for all neighborhood.

Bismarck.—A fire of undetermined origin caused damage estimated at more than $1,000 to the Citizens Military Training camp headquarters at Fort Lincoln. Although important records were saved, the inside of the building was practically destroyed.

Hettinger.—By a vote of 52 to 26, Hettinger county voters voted to dissolve Solen township and let the county commissioners run it under the law of unorganized municipalities. Dissolution was voted because a small tax valuation makes the tax rate too high.

Kensal.—In spite of the big thaws in February, Arrowwood lake is filling up rather slower than anticipated. A rise of between three and four feet will be necessary in order to reach the top level of the dam. Considerable snow and ice still remains in the ravines around the river and lake area.

Grafton.—Grafton's efforts to get a new postoffice have been crowned with success as a contract for the construction of the building has been let. Work will start sometime in May and the building must be completed within a year. Cost of the building will be $44,645.00.

Cando.—The three federated womens clubs of Cando are sponsoring an essay contest open to high school students and have chosen for the subject "The Importance of Law Observance." Essays will be judged on April 15 and may contain from 700 to 1,500 words.

Hazelton.—Wrecking his car while rounding a curve at high speed, Charles Hernett, cashier of the First National bank of Burnstad, committed suicide by shooting himself after he had crawled out of the wreckage. No reason for his action can be advanced.

Hettinger.—In preparation for the get-together of early settlers of this section, plans are being made for the erection of a real old-fashioned sod shack in the local park. A number of people have volunteered their services, as well as trucking equipment, to aid in the construction of the shack.

Rolla.—Sentenced to a term in the state reformatory at Mandan, Clement Mayo broke out of the county jail here by prying up the flour of the cell, crawling underneath the full length of the building and burrowing his way under the foundation of the office. Apprehended late that night, Mayo stated that it took him three hours to get out.

Killdeer.—With members of the Athletic club donating the labor, the Killdeer city hall is being enlarged and remodeled under the sponsorship of the Town Criers, civic organization, and the Athletic club.

Lidgerwood.—The second unlimited public auction sponsored by Lidgerwood business men was called a decided success, when approximately 1,500 customers paid in the neighborhood of $3,000 to the 80 firms here. Free lunch was served and the auction was conducted as a part of the "War Against Depression Campaign."

When TEETHING makes HIM FUSSY

One of the most important things you can do to make a teething baby comfortable is to see that little bowels do their work of carrying off waste matter promptly and regularly. For this nothing is better than Castoria, a pure vegetable preparation specially made for babies and children. Castoria acts so gently you can give it to young infants to relieve colic. Yet it is always effective, for older children, too. Remember, Castoria contains no harsh drugs, no narcotics—is absolutely harmless. When your baby is fretful with teething or a food upset, give a cleansing dose of Castoria. Be sure you get genuine Castoria with the name:

SYNOPSIS

In concern over the disappearance of the young and beautiful wife of his wealthy friend, Crandall White, Aaron Glaenzer engages Motherwell, private investigator to find her. A note from the missing woman warns her husband not to call in the police, saying she "hoped to come back." Mrs. White is younger than her husband, and his devotion has been the talk of New York. Her leaving him is unexplainable. She is known to have with her a remarkable jewel, the "Medusa's Head," but her maid, Coggeshall, thinks she had little else of value. Glaenzer and Motherwell have a talk with Coggeshall, without material results. It is found that Mrs. White has all her jewelry with her. Coggeshall is unable to make any explanation.

"Mrs. White had been worried for some weeks, sir, but I can't say why, and it's no good asking me," she said, facing him obstinately. "I know you're here helping Mr. Glaenzer, and I'd help you all I could, if this had any ways to do with madam's going off, sir. This that I mean hasn't—I'll swear to it before anybody, police or otherwise. Ladies have their worries, Mr. Wells, and my lady has not been herself, to say herself, for some time. But it's got nothing to do with dreadful things like this, and disappearing away and all. I know nothing whatever about this."

"But my dear woman, you can't possibly judge—"

"Excuse me, sir, I can judge about this," said the maid, obstinately, "and you would agree with me, directly you knew. Of that I'm sure. It's this way," she went on, almost pleadingly, and quite honestly, he was certain. "If she don't come back, sir, I'll tell you, and ten to one you'll laugh at it—a gentleman would," she added bitterly. "But if she does (and you think she means to) then she'd never forgive me in God's world, if I'd tell you, sir! Well I know that. You see? It's that kind of thing! But nothing like you think," she ended, looking keenly at him.

There was something convincing about her. She was no fool, this woman.

"Why did you tell me at all, then?" he asked her.

"Because I shouldn't be honest, and not," she answered promptly.

"And she's forgot a lot of things lately, Mr. Wells, and let a lot of things go, and—and—why didn't she mention to me about those jewels, now? And where are they?"

Her face worked painfully.

"She hasn't drawn any checks," he said, watching her. "There's a big balance at the bank."

"Oh, it's not that!" she cried impatiently, and then, "Can't you do something, sir?"

It was extraordinary, the way she appealed to him, seemed to trust him. A man she had supposed to be a jeweler's clerk, ten minutes ago! He realized in himself a distinct alteration of feeling; that flair of his had shifted with the wind. How much did he really believe in Clelia White, the glorious haired, just now? How philosophical he had become, all of a sudden!

Sensitive as a clairvoyant, he had experienced a real thrill of terror—the terror of the writer of that jumbled, blotted letter—when first he read it. Why did it seem to him now that she knew her own business best, probably?

"I'm afraid she'll have to do a little something for us, first, Coggeshall," he answered dryly. "I must telephone Mr. Glaenzer."

Mr. Glaenzer listened in rather noticeable silence to his young friend's communication.

"The articles that were wanted for repair, sir, don't seem to be in the closet you suggested—no, sir, nothing whatever—absolutely certain, yes, sir. Lady must have taken them herself—yes, sir, obviously—of course, that alters the situation— I imagine the lady I met this morning could be of a little more help than she's willing to be at present, but I don't despair of her— Of course I understand that money is no object—I advertised to that effect, this morning— Yes, I think we shall hear again, myself. Good-by, sir."

He came back to the bedroom. Coggeshall was sitting just as he had left her.

"I must get along, now," he said kindly, picking up his bag. "I'll look in later. Of course it depends on you, you know, whether this gets out or not."

"Very well, sir," she said listlessly, "you may depend they'll get nothing out of me, sir. I'll be here. There might be a message for me."

Mr. Wells went lightly down the stairs, bag in hand.

"You'll be here, will you?" he muttered to himself, "now—I wonder?"

CHAPTER IV

At the door of the next house he met an idle-looking youth with a hat box, who whistled as he watched a game of marbles.

"There'll be a lady coming out fairly soon, I think Billy," he said, "don't lose her."

"No, sir," said the messenger boy, still whistling. Mr. Wells stopped at a newsstand and bought an eleven o'clock special. Sitting in a corner drug store he swam through the sea of advertisements it offered him, stopping suddenly with a "By George!"

"Found—Wednesday, green brooch with woman's head. Returned to owner on proper identification" [he read].

Mr. Wells jumped into a taxi, but he did not drive to the address given in the paper. Instead he got out at a decent if rather second-rate hotel on the West side and emerged from its washroom without spectacles or mustache, which made a vast difference in his appearance. When he came down from a room to which he owned the key, apparently, his hat, stick and neck scarf were by no means those of a young man who would carry a bag in the street.

The address led him to a dingy but perfectly neat little office where a typewritten sign announced that multigraphing of the highest quality would be executed promptly and with especial accuracy. A brisk, young-old lady answered his knock and sent a keen gray-eyed glance through him.

"Can you describe the pin, please?" she asked.

"I can do better than that," said Mr. Motherwell pleasantly, "I'll show it to you," and he took from a billfold a colored disk cut from some illustration.

"Is that it, by any chance?" he inquired.

The young lady's features relaxed.

"Well, I'm glad to get that off my mind," she said and going to a black dispatch box on her work-table desk she opened it and came back with a pin the size of a dollar.

"I told mother I'd hear from it," she said, with some satisfaction, "but she said I was crazy. I knew it wasn't worth such a lot, of course, but it was so unusual I was sure it was in the family or something."

Mr. Motherwell gazed calmly at the Head of Medusa in his palm. He even tossed it lightly, and the woman's carven face jeered at his terror as he did so.

"That's the idea, exactly," he said, "my sister will be too delighted for words. I can't thank you enough. When did you find it? She missed it Wednesday, about noon."

"That's it! That's it!" the multigrapher cried. "I told mother that just because whoever took it got mad and threw it away, when she found what it was, that doesn't say it wasn't valuable to somebody! I suppose, you see, she thought it was real!"

"Real?" he stammered.

"Emerald or something. The idea, that size! That's what I always say about that imitation stuff—they make it too big, don't they? Not that a lot of it doesn't get sold, all the same, at the department stores. There seems to be a regular craze for it—those queer, ugly, oriental things, especially."

"Department stores—oh, yes," Mr. Motherwell repeated, and the writhing, wondrous snakes, that were Medusa's hair, laughed wickedly at him.

"Chinese, isn't it?" she asked. "I mean of course, it's meant for that."

"Yes," he answered, "I believe it is. But my sister didn't throw it away—she lost it."

Sneezing—God Bless You

The custom of uttering a benediction after a sneeze is universal. Its origin is obscure and each country seems to have its own particular legend concerning it. Among the Romans the belief existed that a sneeze expelled evil spirits. The sneeze, therefore, was regarded somewhat in the light of a lucky effort on the part of the person to rid his system of evil spirits and those present at the time would say, "Good luck to you." There is also an old legend that before the time of Jacob men sneezed only once and then expired. But the patriarch interceded in the behalf of man and obtained a relaxation of this law on condition that a prayer or benediction follow every sneeze. Some writers offer this old legend as an explanation of the modern sneeze benediction "God bless you."

Historic Region

"Spanish Main" is properly the northern coast of South America, going westward from the mouth of the Orinoco to the Isthmus of Panama, or a little farther; the mainland bordering the Caribbean sea, called by the Spanish conquerors Tierra Firme. The term is often applied, however, to the curving chain of islands forming the northern and eastern boundaries of the Caribbean sea, beginning from Mosquito, near the isthmus, and including Jamaica, Santo Domingo, the Leeward Islands and the Windward islands, to the coast of Venezuela, South America.

Day of Hearty Eating

During the administration of John Quincy Adams, evening assemblies were popular at the homes of congressmen and cabinet members. The parties began at eight o'clock. Promptly at ten o'clock everybody went out on the back porch for "light refreshments." At one end of the table would be a roast ham; at the other a saddle of venison. In between came the wild ducks, and the pastries. And scattered about were cakes and puddings. A large side table held the punch and the madeira.

Iceberg

By JANNIS PARKER

(© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service)

LOU and Harrison were engaged; and Lou's heart was heavy for Conchita, the dancer, was doing what Lou herself had longed to do: break up the ice floes in Harrison.

Even before Conchita had undulated into the picture Lou had been anxious. For instance, at seven on Valentine's evening Harrison, tall, lean, and with a frigid demeanor, had arrived to escort her to a friend's party. He had stooped, his kiss the quick, detached sort of caress that filled her with anxiety.

"You look woe-be-gone. Have I overlooked something fearfully important, little sentimentalist?" he had asked.

On the correct finger of Lou's left hand a gorgeous emerald twinkled. Harrison had asked her to marry him.

"I'm just being silly," Lou had smiled wanly.

He had pinched her cheek. This was not the attitude Lou wanted. She didn't want him to chuckle. She wanted him to feel stirred, intent. She wanted his clear eyes to glow. But they were two frozen pools.

"Harrison, why can't you be a little more . . . oh, I don't know." Her hands had fallen limply to her sides.

He had sought to seal her lips with another calm, undemonstrative kiss. "I'm not a movie actor, you know, Lou."

"Who asked you to act?" Lou had demanded. "I want you to mean it." The color had come tinging into her cheeks.

"I'm a frigid cuss, I know. Yet you and my law practice are my world."

Adoring every fair crispy curling hair in his head, she rebuked herself. He was marvelous and she loved him. She mustn't expect a typically legal mind to express poignant romance.

Midge, whose party they attended, wanted to charter a cab and see how the rest of the world lived.

Never will Lou forget that night. At first she was an inwardly seething torrent of excitement. Then her heart was being eaten out for she had seen Conchita's burning Latin eyes were bringing out fascinated lights from impenetrable Harrison's.

The cafe was dingy. There had been a raucous clamor, but apparently the regular patrons felt chagrined for they surveyed the beautifully attired visitors, snorted, and lapsed into a sullen silence. The proprietor, however, rubbed his pudgy hands delightedly and whispered excitedly to his star performer.

"Conchita, we have ver' swell customers tonight. You will dance your best."

"Conchita always dances superbly, peeg!" That lady snapped her lacquered fingers. "Are not our regular customers more than these pork who come only to jeer?"

The Mexican orchestra throbbed in a low, pulsing rhythm. With a clack of her castanets Conchita, a living flame, stood poised in the middle of the floor. Professional that she was, her long sloe eyes wandered heavy-lidded over her audience, picking a worthy one to whom to dedicate her dance. The drowsiness of her eyes vanished as they lighted on the cool, flawless features of Harrison.

Lou's devoted little heart sank. The rhumba rhythms beat inflictingly on her conservative ears. With a catch in her throat she had to admit she had never seen Harrison so stimulated.

The whirling, insinuating dance halted abruptly. The dancer pressed a long sweet kiss on her vivid fingertips, blew it straight to Harrison, and tossed to him the rose which had nestled in her inky hair.

"Harrison feels shaken," observed Midge. "He's trembling like a leaf."

Lou was trembling, too. She dared not lift her hurt, bewildered eyes.

Nightly Harrison frequented the cafe. Lou, shaken almost beyond endurance, lay between cool sheets and prayed, not for her own forlorn heart, but that splendid man and brilliant attorney that he was, he might not be horribly uprooted.

Then she summoned her frail courage and went to the place herself. She left, pale, trembling, but contentedly wiping her red-rimmed eyes while Conchita's gay laugh bounded after her.

That night, steadfast love seeping from his eyes, Harrison took Lou gently in his arms, then kissed her quivering mouth almost roughly in his fervency.

"Lou darling, let's get married right away!"

In his sturdy embrace Lou felt exalted. Her happiness welled over. Why should she tell him Conchita had admitted she was only playing with him? It would make him feel tainted, cheapened.

"He one big ice-berg," Conchita had flaunted. "Conchita have no place for ice-bergs."

"But you've melted him!" Lou had insisted.

Conchita had stood, her fists dug into her shapely hips. "When ice-berg is melted, what is it? Big puddle. Conchita have no use for puddles either."

So Lou thanked her; for she assigned to Conchita what she felt she had not been able to do for herself, since ice cannot melt ice.

As the sweetness of her clinging to him, and the clean scent of her hair filled him, Harrison decided not to tell her of Conchita. How he had recognized the woman as a missing witness in one of his cases. This lovely, dainty Lou he adored. Why fill her innocent mind with a sordid case of a cabaret dancer?

WHALES PROPERTY OF OLD TRINITY

That Is, if Cast Ashore in "New York Province."

"Thar she blows and breeches and bellows—and sperm at that!" Capt. Esse Boles probably did not give the historic cry of Mr. Simmons, the finest first mate of the good ship Mozambique, when a whale ran away with his anchor off Green Run, Va., recently, and nearly sent the fishing smack Sea Toy to Davy Jones.

That marauding animal may or may not have been a sperm; possibly it was a right whale, or even a bottlenose. At any rate, schools of whales, though not so common off the Atlantic coast as they were in older days, are often seen at certain seasons, some of them coming even to the mouth of the channels leading to New York harbor. A few years ago a small whale actually got into the upper bay. Whales naturally go where their particular food is most plentiful; formerly they came in schools to Long Island and created an offshore whaling industry for the shellbacks of East Hampton and Sag Harbor.

One rarely, if ever, associates whales with churches, even though the Bible gives us the story of Jonah; but in the vaults of the corporation of Trinity church there is a unique document which grants to Old Trinity the right to all whales cast ashore in the "Province of New York."

The charter of Trinity church was signed in New York on May 6, 1697 in the ninth year of the reign of King William III; but before that the "Managers of the Affairs of the Church of England" had begun the construction of a church. On September 9, 1696, in anticipation of the charter, the royal governor granted a patent to the wardens and other managers "to seize upon and secure all Weifts Wrecks Drift Whales and whatsoever else Drives from the high sea and is then lost below high water mark and not having a lawful Owner within bounds and limits of his Majesties Province of New York."

The managers were also empowered "to tow ashore and then to cut up the said whales and try into oyle and secure the whalebone," applying the proceeds "towards the building of the church aforesaid and to no other use whatsoever until the same be perfectly finished."

Later the privilege was extended so as to give the vestry of Trinity the right to whales that drifted ashore on the island of Nassau.—New York Times.

ODD "INDUSTRIES" IN BRITISH ISLES

Almost under the shadow of Westminster cathedral is a narrow thoroughfare called Strutton ground, and here you will find an Armenian who claims to be the only outdoor repairer of timepieces in London and perhaps in England. He will mend your watch while you wait, says a writer in Pearson's Weekly.

"Bottler of smoke" is surely one of the oldest of professions, yet in the census returns we find one person who so describes himself. The smoke comes from hickory logs and no doubt is used for the curing of bacon. Less puzzling is the industry of collecting walrus whiskers, which has only one follower in the British Isles. These walrus whiskers go to the East, where wealthy Chinese prize them as toothpicks.

There are two lighthouse builders in England, but only one man who sells his skin for a living. This man, formerly a mechanic, saw one day an advertisement asking for a healthy subject who would consent to sell a portion of his skin to be grafted on the face of a rich man's child who had been badly burned. He got two hundred pounds for his trouble and has since been in hospitals in various parts of the world on similar missions.

A farmer on a big load of hay in a city street still looks as grand as he ever did.

Fools Them All

THEY never guess his age . . . miss it by ten years at least . . . always think he's younger. Besides, he has such a young, attractive wife who simply is devoted to him.

Why doesn't he ever feel run down and out of "pep"? The answer is Fellows' Syrup, the wonderful tonic which restores frayed nerves and tired bodies. You quickly feel the good which this medicine does to the entire system. Get a bottle at your druggist's, today. Remember, doctors recommend it.

FELLOWS' SYRUP

Easy Way to Call Children

"I find the porch light a great help in calling the children home," writes a mother in the Parents' Magazine. "In the winter, when they are playing out in the snow or in a neighbor's house, turning on the light saves me a trip to call them. Even in the summer when they play out in the long evenings, they can readily see it the length of the block when they are watching for it."

A World's Record

MORE than three thousand births without a single loss of either mother or child! That is the official Piatt County record of Dr. W. B. Caldwell, in fifty years' family practise in Illinois.

No wonder mothers have such entire confidence in giving little ones Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin!

If you have a baby, you have constant need of this wonderful preparation of pure pepsin, active senna, and fresh herbs. A child who gets this gentle stimulant for the stomach, liver and bowels is always healthier. It keeps children's delicate systems from clogging. It will overcome the most stubborn condition of constipation. It builds them up, and is nothing like the strong cathartics that sap their strength and energy.

A coated tongue or bad breath is the signal for a spoonful of Syrup Pepsin. Children take it readily, for it is really delicious in flavor. Taste it! Take Syrup Pepsin yourself, when sluggish or bilious, or you are troubled with sick headaches and no appetite. Take some for several days when run-down, and see how it picks you up.

It is a prescription preparation which every drug store has ready; in big bottles, just ask anywhere for Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin.

Profanity Called For, and Caddy Was "There"

Dr. J. Whitcomb Brougher, now of Boston, but formerly of Los Angeles, took a fling at golf on the public links in Franklin park. He was doing splendidly until he reached the seventh hole, when he sliced his drive and had the embarrassment of seeing it dribble at right angles down the slope into an almost impossible lie.

As he gazed after the ball sadly, a vehement string of profanity shattered the air and turning sharply, Doctor Brougher stood aghast as his caddy spluttered cuss words on all six.

"Great heavens, lad!" demanded Doctor Brougher, "what is the reason for all this profanity?"

"Well," replied the tough little caddy, "after a shot like that, somebody had to cuss and knowing you're too ignorant to do it, I thought I'd better do it myself."—Los Angeles Times.

Irish Spurn New Homes

Claddagh, the picturesque fishing village in Galway, may not be abandoned after all. For generations the interesting people, with their traditions of Spain and the Gael, have lived there, and the present generation likes the place. Recently the Free State government offered to build a new village for them, and the Claddaghites at first were enthusiastic, but after estimating the extra taxes and rents, they refused to desert their old thatched cottages for comfortable houses with slate roofs.

How One Man Lost 22 Pounds

Mr. Herman Runkis of Detroit writes: "A few lines of thanks from a rheumatism sufferer—my first bottle of Kruschen Salts took all the aches and swellings out of my joints—with my first bottle I went on a diet and lost 22 pounds and now I feel like a new man."

To lose fat SAFELY and quickly take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water in the morning before breakfast.

For your health's sake ask for and get Kruschen—the cost for a bottle that lasts 4 weeks is but a trifle at any drugstore in the world and if after the first bottle you are not joyfully satisfied with results—money back. All good druggists will be glad to supply you.

Were it not for the skill of the dentists, the number of snapshots showing persons engaged in laughter might be lessened.

CANNER AND FARMER

PEOPLE demand a higher degree of perfection in all things today than they did a few years back—better houses, better clothes, better food. Before the era of modern canning a woman who went into a store to buy a pound of string beans, for example, expected to take the bad with the good and make the best of it. Today she expects all the beans to be uniformly good.

The perfection attained in recent years by canned foods, and the low prices at which they are sold at all seasons, has no doubt been instrumental in raising the standard of all foods. Perhaps you have wondered how such a uniform perfection of canned foods has been attained—why all canned peaches are good peaches, and all the peas in a can are "alike as peas in the pod."

From the Ground Up

The answer goes back of the canning factory itself to the fields of the farmer who contracts in advance to sell his crops to the canner. For, with the exception of fish, the food materials which are canned—that is fruits, vegetables, milk, meat and syrup—are products of the farm. Each year canners spend several hundred million dollars for fruits, vegetables and milk. The reason they contract for so much of this in advance is in order to get a perfect product. Canned foods never would have attained their present popularity if canners had depended for their raw materials on market surplus or stock that is otherwise unmarketable.

So the care of the canners really starts in the soil in which their products are grown. Some of them even produce their own raw materials, and hire agricultural experts to handle that part of the business for them. Not only must the various fruits and vegetable products be varieties suitable for canning, but these products must be grown near enough to the cannery to permit them to ripen fully in the field and to insure prompt canning. Canners usually select their own seeds or stocks, or advise their grower, or the farmer for whose crops they have contracted, in their selection.

After proper seed selection follow proper cultivation, proper harvesting and prompt delivery. All this is essential to the production of good raw material. The canner follows the seed from the soil to the can. He knows, for instance, that he must have pure seed peas of uniformly maturing varieties so that they will ripen evenly and, with favorable weather and under proper supervision, yield a satisfactory product. If either the seed or the weather prove unreliable, the product will not be satisfactory, and that is his risk.

Farmer Benefits

One great risk is eliminated, however, for the farmer who sells his crops to the canner in advance. That is the risk of market and market price. So he can devote all his efforts to raising good food, and the road from farm to table is thereby appreciably shortened. This combination of effort by the farmer and canner is what has brought about a consumption of canned foods commensurate with their dietetic value, their cleanliness, their wholesomeness, and the dependability and wholesomeness with which housewives now associate them.

Here are some tested recipes for housewives who are interested in adding to their list of new ways to serve these superior foods:

Apple Sauce Loaf Cake: Cream one-third cup butter and one cup sugar. Add one teaspoon soda to one and one-fourth cups canned apple sauce, and add to the butter and sugar mixture. Add two cups flour, one teaspoon baking powder, a few grains of salt, one-half teaspoon cloves, one-half teaspoon allspice and one-fourth teaspoon nutmeg. Then add the grated rind of one lemon. Add one-half cup raisins and one-half cup nuts (reserve a little of the flour to sift over them). Bake in a loaf in a 350 degree oven for from 45 to 60 minutes.

Spinach and Beet Mold: Cook fresh, spring spinach until tender, or use canned spinach. Drain, season well with butter, salt and pepper and pack while hot into a buttered ring mold. Keep hot while preparing beets. Heat canned beets, chop, and season well with butter, salt and pepper. Turn spinach mold out onto a platter and fill center with beets. Chopped, hard-cooked eggs may be sprinkled over the spinach ring.*

The County Fair

With 75 Marshall county business firms cooperating in the distribution of free automobile tickets for the 26th annual Marshall County Fair and Ninth District American Legion Convention to be held in Warren June 27, 28 and 29, interest in the big summer exposition is quickly gaining momentum with indications now pointing to a record breaking fair, Wm. Forsberg, president of the fair association, announced.

Leading business firms in Holt, Alvarado, Argyle, Middle River, Newfolden, Stephen, Radium, Oslo, Strandquist, Viking and Warren have joined in the distribution of tickets which are being given away with each $1.00 cash purchase or $1.00 paid on account. Lists of cooperating merchants are being published in the News today. Additional names will be added to the list as the campaign progresses, said Mr. Forsberg.

Premium lists for the 1932 fair are now practically ready for publication and will be ready for distribution within the near future. A large number of inquiries have been received for copies of the list in all sections of the county, showing that the exhibits at the fair this year will come up to the high standard of former years, said J. A. Grindeland, secretary.

Adopting a new policy this year, children under 12 years of age, will be admitted free to the fair, if accompanied by parent or guardian. With this policy in effect, it is believed that a large number of people will attend the fair, that otherwise would stay at home because of financial difficulties. Prices of admission for the evening programs have also been reduced from 50 to 25 cents, this fact also meeting with much favor among the people of Northwestern Minnesota, fair association directors have gleaned.

Although the program details have not yet been completed, the attractions which have so far been contracted for to date far surpass any attractions that have ever been offered at a Marshall county fair. The outstanding act will be Rosie's Ritz Revue consisting of 36 people including a five piece orchestra which will present a complete change of program nightly.

The Ninth District American Legion band together with outstanding drum and bugle corps teams from various cities of the Ninth district will also be an attraction this year.

The Lachman Carson Shows, a large carnival troupe, which contains twenty carloads of material and travels in its own train, was selected as the ground show for the twenty-sixth annual fair.

The acts that make up the program are as follows: The World Famous Three White Cuhn's, consisting of one act made up of four individuals. Second on the list is the Cordova troupe which gives two acts and is made up of five people; third, Kayo and Yama Japs whose three persons present two acts.

A feature of the program is the act of Captain Hugo, who presents a high aerial bycycle act, riding through a gap of fire. His act also include a High Diving act.

Low Freight Rates

A drastic reduction in the minimum weight for carload shipments of livestock from Holt and other Minnesota points to South St. Paul was put into effect April 1 by the Great Northern in a determined effort to re-capture the livestock business from the highway transportation agencies.

Savings to Marshall county livestock shippers will, in many instances, amount to about one-third of the present charges, according to C. A. Larson, Great Northern agent here.

Under the tariff arrangement worked out by the Great Northern and adopted also by the other lines, the minimum carload weight for mixed livestock shipments was reduced from 19,000 to 12,000 pounds. In other words, the shipper who has 12,000 lbs. or more of cattle, hogs and sheep to send to South St. Paul will pay the basic fixed or sheep rate on the actual weight of the shipment, instead of the 19,000 lbs., the former minimum for mixed carload shipments.

The savings, however, are not confined to mixed shipments, as the mixed rate with the 6-ton minimum will apply on straight shipmens of every class of livestock where the present charge is higher. Existing rates on the several classes of livestock vary according to the weight of shipment, with higher rates on the the smaller carloads, so that the savings will apply quite generally and be substantial in amount Mr. Larson said.

An idea of how drastic the Great Northern's step is, is seen in the fact that the last state legislature reduced the minimum carload weight from 22,000 lbs. to 19,000 pounds -- a minimum which the railroad has now cut voluntarily to 12,000 pounds.

Examples of the application of the new minimum carload rate given by Mr. Larson follow:

From Holt to South St. Paul, the former carload charge on a shipment of cattle, hogs and sheep weighing 12,000 pounds was $61.75 (19,000 pounds at 32½c per hundred weight). The carload charge on the new basis for the same shipment is $40.20, a saving to the shipper of $21.55.

On a straight 12,000 - pound shipment of cattle from Holt the former rate of 29½ cents per hundred pounds made the charge $64.90, or more than the new mixed rate of $40.20 on the 12,000 - pound minimum mixed carload. In such cases the new mixed rate applies, thus effecting a saving of $24.70 to shippers from Holt.

Just How New Yorker Happened to Be "Let In"

John Stewart Bryan, himself a Virginian, tells of a man from Charleston, S. C., who returned home from a visit to New York. Somebody asked him how he enjoyed himself and the colonel said: "Fine! We had a great dinner at Delmonico's. Colonel Ravenell was there; Major Elliott from Columbia was there; three of the Screvens came from Savannah, and there was General Breckenridge from Kentucky and Beverly Randolph from Virginia."

"That made eight, with you?"

"No, there were nine. Oh, yes; there was a fellow from New York there."

"How did he get in?"

"Oh," said the colonel, "he was giving the dinner!"—Boston Globe.

Texas Preserves Relic

The oldest complete structure still remaining in Texas is the stone fort at San Pedro Springs, San Antonio. Plans to preserve it are well advanced. Its construction is placed at various dates between 1600 and 1716. The stone fort formed the southwest corner of a cedar stockade, burned by Indians. Defense of the old fort from attacks of decay has been spurred on by recent loss of the old stone market house and the Veramendi palace. Both these old buildings gave way to the march of industry. The fort is on ground made a park by the city, so is free from danger of razing.

LURE OF NORTH CALLS YOUTH

Explorers Tell of Riches in Great Bear Country.

Vancouver, B. C.—Almost due west of Stewart which nestles among the mountains at the end of the appendix-like Portland canal that separates Alaska from British Columbia lies the valley of the Ingenika. Immediately south is the country drained by the Omineca. All this area is some 580 miles from Vancouver as the crow flies. And from this district to 500 miles further north where the Great Bear country sprawls about Great Bear lake is the most highly mineralized section in the whole world. It is upon this immensely rich northern district that the eyes of young Vancouver are just now turned.

For like Nordic St. Johns, crying out in a wilderness of degenerate softness, certain explorers have been wintering in Vancouver, preaching the gospel of pioneering and unfolding marvelous tales of the unrivaled wealth of the North. The result has been a wave of "north consciousness" throughout all British Columbia.

This North country, says these explorers, has been libeled and abused, just as all northerly areas have been since the beginning of time.

It is true that the North has long, cold winters, but its summers, three months of almost continuous sunshine, makes practically hothouse conditions for productive effort. Moreover the cold of the North is dry. Twenty below zero in dry cold is more tolerable then twenty above zero in the damp atmosphere of the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. But these are little things that can be overcome by the aid of science and the application of the pioneer spirit.

The point is that the Canadian North, northern British Columbia to the Northwest Territories, holds more mineral wealth than North America has yet produced. There is gold in the Ominecas that will materially enrich the world's supply. There is silver in the Ingenikas occurring in solid, almost pure blocks. In the Peace river country there is anthracite and wheat production enough for ten Americas.

In the Great Bear country there has been blocked out by hand $25,000,000 worth of pitchblende containing radium. Twenty tons of this ore was brought down in 1931 and it assayed as high as $8,600 a ton. The extent of the total deposit cannot even be guessed.

These are the tales, borne out by authentic facts and indisputable proofs, that these explorers are pouring into the ears of langorous Canadian youths whose romance has hitherto been derived from a synthetic tickling of the nerves with blase adventures in stocks and bonds. So now, everywhere in the West, young men are throwing off bond consciousness to assume North consciousness.

Big Subterranean Water Supply Under Nebraska

Lincoln, Neb.—Nebraska has enough underground water in the south central part of the state to form a lake twice as large and twice as deep as the Great Salt Lake of Utah.

This is the estimate of Dr. A. G. Lugn, geologist of the University of Nebraska, who has made a survey.

The water is held in formation of sand and gravel made during the glacial periods, according to the geologist.

Nebraska is traversed by the Platte river from one end to the other. The waters from the Platte seep away underground, he said, to the rivers along the southern border of the state. This accounts for the dryness of the Platte during the summer months.

Tut-Ankh-Amen Shrines Placed in Cairo Museum

Cairo.—The four magnificent gilt shrines which inclose the sarcophagus of Tut-Ankh-Amen's tomb have been placed in the Antiquities museum here.

The innermost shrine has already been re-erected and is on view. It is constructed of solid wood covered with gesso overlaid with gold leaf, with sacred figures in gold. The outside has been restored to its original brilliance, but it appears that Tut's artificer cheated his royal master by using an inferior quality of gold inside which has now oxidized and lost color. The shrine is 9 feet 6 inches long and 5 feet high.

Another recent addition to the Antiquities museum is a unique caricature of the heretical King Akhenaten. The caricature, showing the king with beard and whiskers, was found at Tellel-Amara, suggesting that the king possibly became mentally deficient and was allowed to end his days obscurely when the center of religion and government reverted to Thebes.

Bandits Who Dynamite Fish to Be Cleaned Out

Hammerfest, Norway.—Following the example of the French government in cleaning up Corsican bandits, the Norwegian government intends to clean out the fishing bandits, who are raiding the banks off northern Norway with dynamite and destroying thousands of tons of valuable food every season.

War has been declared, and the coast guard and police forces are planning a campaign for protection of the industry, on which more than 90 per cent of the northern folk are dependent.

Since 1911 it has been illegal to kill fish by dynamite, but it always has been carried on.

U. S. Army Air Man Holds Four Flying Ratings

San Antonio, Texas.—Maj. William E. Kepner, World war balloonist and holder of the Distinguished Service cross, has been assigned to duty at Wright field, Dayton, following his graduation from the Air Corps Advanced Flying school at Kelly field here.

Major Kepner will become one of the few air corps officers to hold four flying ratings. Besides being rated an airship pilot, balloon observer, and airplane observer, he has qualified to pilot three types of airships—rigid, semi-rigid, and nonrigid.

Major Kepner has won both the national and international balloon races.

TRAP FISH WITH LIGHT

Electric Bulb Expected to Lure Rare Specimens.

San Francisco, Calif.—An electric light 3,000 feet below the surface of the Pacific ocean is rare enough, San Francisco scientists believe, to capitalize piscatorial curiosity and yield some equally rare marine specimens.

A recently developed device is going to be used by scientists aboard the Templeton Crocker yacht, Zaca, in a six months expedition to the Galapagos, Tres Marias and other island groups off the west coast of Mexico. It is a lighted bulb that can be lowered to a maximum depth of more than half a mile in the water.

The light globe is in the center of a lattice-like box. Curious fish and crustaceans can get through the openings to investigate the light, but they can't get out.

Fish that live too far under water to take an interest in a brilliantly-hued fly are considered an inquisitive lot by Dr. Barton W. Everman of the California Academy of Sciences.

The light, Doctor Everman believes, will attract rather than repel all free swimming things, including microscopic sea life. He expects the Zaca to return next fall with thousands of new species of underwater life in preservatives, as well as many alive in specially constructed tanks.

The expedition will also devote some time to gathering of insects, birds and mammals native to the seldom visited islands in tropical waters.

MAY LIVE IN JUNGLE

Col. P. H. Fawcett, famous British explorer who disappeared into the trackless wilds of the Brazilian jungles seven years ago, may still be alive. The British consul general at Sao Paulo has announced a most definite clew as to the whereabouts of Fawcett and his son John, who accompanied him on the trip in 1925. Stephen Rattin, a jungle trapper, told the consul that he conversed with a man who claimed to be Fawcett, at an Indian encampment approximately six weeks' journey from Sao Paulo.

Lloyd George Tries His Hand at Psalm Writing

Such is the versatile record of Lloyd George, British war-time premier. During his recent stay in Criccieth, Wales, the veteran Liberal leader translated six verses of the psalm "Thy Kingdom Come, O God" into Welsh.

The psalm is a beautiful metrical version and will be sung at the Psalmody festivals of the Welsh churches and the Eisteddfodau.

Turkey and Persia Make English Legal Tongue

London.—The governments of Turkey and Persia have decided to adept English as the language for their official communication. French, which has been the language of diplomacy in the east for centuries, is to be replaced.

The Turkish government is now canvassing England for celebrated English orientalists who are needed as teachers. Altogether, from 3,000 to 3,500 professors and instructors are wanted from Great Britain and the United States.

The two countries entered into discussions on the plan following the breakdown of Riza Khan's efforts to introduce the Roman alphabet in Persia two years ago. English will henceforth be taught in the schools of both countries. It is even said that the Koran will be translated and read only in English in Turkish schools.

Beauty Talks

Beauty on Every Hand

HOW many times, I wonder, have you and you and you been shocked by an ugly hand hiding behind a trim and stylish glove. Were it not for the protection they give and the finished look they add to the costume ensemble I would be all for abolishing gloves. For time and again it has been proven that exposure is the incentive to greater beauty.

The very first rule to remember when handing yourself beauty is that the hands must match your face in general tone and texture. Never cream your face without doing as much for your hands. When you cleanse, tone, nourish or bleach the face and neck take a minute to follow the same beautifying process for your hands, too. It will be time well spent, I promise you.

It is a very stubborn sort of skin that does not respond to a week or two of kindly care. Rough, chapped hands soon take on a satin smoothness if treated to a nourishing cream, a hand lotion or a soothing balm. This should be smoothed into the hands at night just before one retires, and also several times during the day after the hands have been washed.

For red and rough hands the old formula of glycerin and rose water, or equal parts of glycerin and spirits of camphor should prove both bleaching and nourishing.

Hands that are chapped should avoid soap and water for a few weeks. A cleansing cream is both soothing and cleansing.

And every hand—from the loveliest to the ugliest should receive the proper protection before it is sent outdoors. In the winter the chill blasts will redden and roughen and chap the skin. In the summer the sun's heat saps the skin of the natural oils making it dry and leathery looking. A finishing cream smoothed over the hands and a dusting of powder to top the loveliness is sufficient to carry smooth, white beauty through a busy day.

Fruit juice stains are not new to the homemaker. The lowly lemon is a handy thing to have about if you are seeking hand beauty. A bit of tomato juice will also remove fruit stains.

The hands of youth and beauty present a beautifully healthy skin tone, clear, transparent—not a dead white but the proverbial peaches and cream loveliness. The hands of youth and beauty are hands you love to hold for their satin smooth loveliness. No wrinkles, no discolorations, no ragged nails ever mar the hands of youth and beauty. Hand yourself beauty and remember that beautiful hands are also on the march in the spring fashion parade.

Make-Up Need Not Make You Look Bizarre

IN ADDITION to the many women who have not yet adopted cosmetics, there is still another group. The group consists of women who are under the mistaken impression that using rouge or powder will make them look too-obviously "made up." They associate maek-up in general with an eccentric, exaggerated effect.

Make-up is a subtle art. To use none at all is to commit as grave an offense against beauty as to use too much. The pallid, haggard woman is almost as much of an eyesore as the too-obviously painted lady. But by choosing the right rouge and powder—a shade to match the skin, texture to make blending easy, a quality that will in no way hurt the skin—and by applying these touches skillfully one can achieve not only a natural but a beautiful effect as well.

To achieve a natural effect the first requisite is to select a shade of rouge that blends perfectly with your natural coloring.

If you have so little natural coloring that you are in doubt what it is, there are several ways of determining it. When you are flushed, notice your color, or when exercising, the blood will rush to the surface, or after patting with skin tonic, notice the color as well as the color outline, that is just where the "key" or deepest shade is and notice how it fades away gradually.

The next step is to blend the rouge to simulate the natural color outline—apply it to the "key spot" then blend it so that it fades away. Edges should never be definitely outlined, but softened so that they are scarcely perceptible. A cream rouge is best suited to this blending process and achieves a warmer, more natural, glowing and healthful effect.

Powder should also match the skin and should harmonize with eyes and hair. Choose a good quality powder and one of good texture. When applying the powder do not rub it into the skin. Pat it on in an upward and outward direction, then gently smooth it over.

And while on the subject of make-up, let me urge you to adopt a lip paste or lipstick, too. Rosy cheeks and pale lips do not conform with natural order of things.

A too-obvious make-up should be avoided. But a natural make-up will only serve to enhance your beauty, to make you look more healthful, more alive.

Famous English Hotel One of World's Oldest

"Ye Olde Griffin hotel," at March, Cambridgeshire, England, one of the best known hotels in the eastern counties, dating back to 1600, has been sold. It was a noted house in old coaching days, and the coaches at times drove through the space where the front doors are now into the courtyard at the back. An offer of $5,000 has been made and refused for the remarkable paneling in the commercial room.

The walls of the hall are of Indian carved teak, and all the ceilings are supported by the original massive oak beams, while the ancient card room is still in existence. The bath is of real Italian marble, hewn out of the solid stone, and was originally used by the Italian monks, and subsequently brought to England. The hotel has been the subject of articles by Charles Dickens, G. K. Chesterton, Hilaire Belloc, and others, and is visited by many distinguished people during the season.—Detroit News.

Medusa's Head

Josephine Daskam Bacon

SYNOPSIS

In concern over the disappearance of the young and beautiful wife of his wealthy friend, Crandall White, Aaron Glaenser engages Motherwell, private investigator, to find her. A note from the missing woman warns her husband not to call in the police, saying she "hoped to come back." Mrs. White is younger than her husband, and his devotion has been the talk of New York. Her leaving him is unexplainable. She is known to have with her a remarkable jewel, the "Medusa's Head," but her maid, Coggeshall, thinks she had little else of value. It is found that Mrs. White has all her jewelry with her. Coggeshall talks mysteriously of her mistress being "worried." Through an advertisement Motherwell secures the Medusa's head, which, he is told, an "old woman" had thrown out of a cab. From the finder he gets a clew which sends him to the office of Doctor Wentzel, consulting chemist.

"Oh, yes, your sister lost it all right, but the one that stole it threw it away," she corrected him. "I was sitting in the window, watching out for mother. And a woman came out from over there somewhere—I didn't notice—and jumped into a taxi that hardly stopped. I sort of watched her for a moment, and what did she do but take something out of a bag and throw it right out of the window! It fell in the mud that was left in the gutter on this side. I wouldn't have thought much about it you know, but she looked so mad, it struck me at the time. Perfectly furious, she looked! And just then I saw mother coming along and I ran down to help her over. So just as we stepped on this side I remembered the green button, and I looked down, and there it was! I thought it was quite pretty at first—I'm dreadfully short-sighted without my glasses—till I saw those dreadful snakes. So real looking—ugh! Mother wanted to throw it away on account of germs and everything, and then, ~~as she says,~~ it couldn't have been worth much, for a woman to throw it away like that. But all the same I do think it's worth more than—"

She paused and blushed. His sister had liked it, anyway!

"I told mother I thought it was worth nearer twenty-five than five," she said. "Look at all the work on it!"

"I'm sure it is," he agreed, "it's worth that to my sister to get it back! She wanted me to—"

"Oh, I couldn't think of it—please!" cried the multigrapher, embarrassed. "I told mother anybody'd be glad to pay for the three insertions, and it didn't cost me anything. I was sure it was a family piece!"

He bowed politely.

"As it happens," he said, "my firm has quiet a bit of multigraphing to do, every now and then. You may be sure I shall remember this, Miss—Miss—"

"Fleshman," she said gratefully. "I've always satisfied, I think."

He paid for the three insertions briskly.

"What did this thief look like, by the way?" he asked.

"I hadn't my glasses! All I could say was that she was white as a sheet, and had a green ribbon around her head. And she looked dreadful!"

He took out of his pocketbook a little photogravure of a popular actress whose resemblance to Clelia White was well known in New York.

"Did she look like that?" he asked.

"Goodness, no!" Miss Fleshman answered readily, "that's a young woman. This was rather an ordinary looking woman— I don't remember—she had a dark suit on and a motor bonnet—"

She was evidently visualizing the little scene to the best of her ability.

"She was all alone?"

"Oh, yes, all alone. The cab was going along looking for fares, and she ran out and stopped it."

"From which place?"

"I couldn't say at all. It might have been anywhere."

He studied her idly. He seemed to have endless leisure, this young man.

"There—just about where that woman's coming out, I should say," she said suddenly.

He looked. His jaw dropped slightly.

"Oh, there!" he said. "I know a man over there—I think I'll hop over and see him—good day, Miss Fleshman, I'll be in again about that multigraphing."

He was gone.

At the corner he caught up with the errand boy, still loafing along with his hat box.

"Where'd she go?" he asked, passing him and stopping to light a cigarette.

"Wentzel's, second floor back," the boy answered. "She made a row in there and cried, coming out. Talked to herself."

"Keep right after her, Bill," and ran easily up the steps the woman had just come

The second floor office at the back announced itself as devoted to the interests of P. Wentzel, consulting chemist. Analyses of every description. Appointments at convenience.

Mr. Motherwell rang and entered.

It was a stuffy little room, but perfectly neat, in a cluttered, scientific way. One wall was covered with books, the other with framed diplomas and certificates in German. All of these pointed to the general efficiency and specific attainments of P. Wentzel, who was referred to, interchangeably, as professor and doctor. A bored young man, obviously American, sat at a crowded roll-top desk, near a telephone. As Motherwell entered he was explaining somewhat irritably by means of this instrument that while he would take any amount of messages, and was there absolutely for that purpose, in fact, he could make no appointments whatever.

"Professor out?" said Motherwell lightly, glancing at the diplomas.

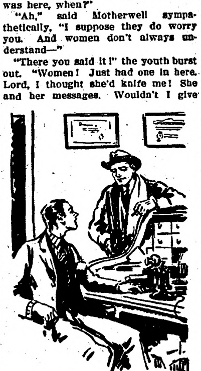
"You've hit it!" returned the youth. "Any message? He'll look in any time, I guess."

"As when?" Motherwell inquired. "I wanted to see him, if I could. My specimens—"

"Nothing doing," said the youth flatly. "It's no good asking me, because I don't know a thing about 'em. I can take a message, and you can leave your number, if you like. You'd think I made specimens. All that work's done in the lab'ratory. There's nothing here. How can I tell who was here, when?"

"Ah," said Motherwell sympathetically, "I suppose they do worry you. And women don't always understand—"

"There you said it!" the youth burst out. "Women! Just had one in here. Lord, I thought she'd knife me! She and her messages. Wouldn't I give 'em to her if I had 'em? What's Mrs. Gray to me—or Mrs. Pink or Mrs. Blue? You'd think the professor ran a post office!"



"Women! Just Had One in Here. Lord, I Thought She'd Knife Me!"

"Oh, well," Motherwell remarked pacifically, "you know women do leave messages for each other—"

"I see old Wentzy taking 'em, too!" said the youth scornfully, and accepted an excellent cigarette. "Nothing else to do, of course—and him called up by the Rockefeller push and the P. and S. and all the big bugs! Why, I'm worn out with it! Look at that table there," and he pointed to a heap of bundles and bottles on a heavy table by the door.

"All left to be called for—boys and messengers pawing over it, to get 'em back, if the professor can't get at 'em immediately!

"'Very well,' I tell 'em, 'prove up on it and take it away, if that's the idea! You can't see him. Give me a voucher and get out.' Some of 'em aren't even tagged—look at that thing!"

He pointed to a good-sized box wrapped in purple paper. Motherwell stared at it. Half the wrapper had been torn off—and the torn piece he had seen the night before, blistered and scribbled, in Mr. Glaenzer's olive, blue-veined hand! He drew a deep breath.

"For the love of Mike, that's mine!" he said excitedly, "that's my specimen! Do you mean to say the professor hasn't touched it?"

The youth shrugged his shoulders elaborately.

"There you are!" he said, "as bad as the rest! Now, what's your trouble? Where's your receipt? Want it back?"

Heroes of World War

The "Lost Battalion," is the name given to the Three Hundred and Eighth regiment, United States infantry, commanded by Lieut. Col. Charles W. Whittlesey. Whittlesey was ordered to advance through the densest part of the great forests of the Argonne during the World war in order to take a certain point and hold it. Far in advance of the other troops, he was soon surrounded by the enemy and attacked for four days and nights. More than 100 hours passed without his men obtaining any food and only a little water. The majority of his command was killed or wounded, but Whittlesey refused to surrender. He was eventually relieved.

Poor Drinking

He found his hair was leaving the top of his head and complained to his barber that the two bottles of hair tonic he had bought seemed to make matters worse, if any. "It's strange," said the barber, "I don't understand it." "Well, look here," said the man, "I don't mind drinking another botttle, but this must be the last."

POULTRY

FOOD OF QUALITY FOR BREEDING HENS

Only Way to Get Best Eggs and Healthy Chicks.

"Poultry has suffered along with other farm crops, but due to the drop in feed prices in proportion to the prices being received for eggs, and because of the mild winter permitting production to stay at level, poultrymen have been much encouraged to go ahead with their work," says Roy S. Dearstyne, head of the poultry department at North Carolina state college. "However, some poultrymen have attempted to increase their margin of profit by decreasing the feeding or substituting certain feeds which do not give as good results. One of the main substitutions being practiced is to use vegetable protein feeds for animal protein feeds. Soy bean meal and peanut meal are good if used in limited quantities, but they should not entirely displace the animal protein, especially when production is heavy and the eggs are being used for hatching."

Any radical change from the usual methods of feeding at this time is likely to be reflected in the hatchability of the eggs or the livability of the chicks, Mr. Dearstyne says. The breeding hens should be fed so that they will produce only the highest quality of eggs.

Mr. Dearstyne insists that green feed, plenty of sunlight, an adequate mineral supply and milk in some form, should be fed the birds to get the best eggs for producing healthy chicks. If the breeding birds are to be through a long laying season and maintain body weight, they must be fed a balanced ration. It is particularly unwise to depend on grain feeds alone without mash.

Chickens a Life Saver, Says Ohio Poultryman

R. W. Sweitzer, poultryman, has told the Ohio Farmer how he managed to reduce feed costs in his flocks. "To make money we had to press down on feed costs," says Sweitzer. He believes the cost of grinding grains for poultry is a wasted expense. He feeds a free choice ration with corn, wheat, germinated oats, meat scraps and milk before the birds at all times. Greens are supplied by cabbage and apples and cod liver oil is fed in the grain.

Mr. Sweitzer raises all his grain and buys only concentrates. "Last year," showed Sweitzer, "we received 6 cents a pound for our grain by marketing it through our hens." Dairy cows were his main line until disease broke out and he had to sell his stock. "Our chickens at this time proved a life saver," he said.

Causes of Paralysis

Paralysis is occasionally seen in chickens that are heavily fed and grow rapidly. It is also seen where there is overcrowding and poor ventilation. Let them have plenty of sour milk and green feed and add one teaspoonful of fluid extract of nux vomica to each pint of drinking water.

There is a form of paralysis that attacks mostly young birds, for which there is no treatment of any value and is usually fatal. In cases of this kind, it is advisable to get a new flock and put them in new buildings on clean land. Changing the old flock to new ground or buildings does not stamp out the disease.—Michigan Farmer.

Incubator Pointers

Level the incubator with a spirit level and place bits of wood under any leg that seems short. This not only helps to keep an even heat in the egg chambers but prevents the vibration that occurs when the floor is uneven and one of the incubator legs does not rest firmly.

A cellar is the best location for the incubator as it is free from vibration and the air will be rather moist. When the machines are operated in an upstairs room the entire family must be careful to avoid running, heavy walking, banging doors or carelessly leaving them open and chilling the air around the machine.

Need Cod Liver Oil

Poultry kept around cities where smoke abounds do not get sufficient sunshine in winter time, and hence cod liver oil is necessary for them, Prof. E. L. Dakan, of the Ohio State university, says after testing out several flocks. Two years ago he fed all flocks without cod liver oil except one, and that one pen laid the most eggs. Next year he fed cod liver to all flocks except one, and that year this single pen without oil had the lowest production of all.—Ohio Farmer.

Heavy Layers

Hens have to meet a high standard before they are used for breeding purposes at the United States live stock experiment station at Beltsville, Md. Poultry men of the Department of Agriculture choose breeding hens only from those which produce at least 225 eggs in the pullet years and whose eggs average at least two ounces in weight. They save only the chickens from hens whose eggs are at least 70 per cent hatchable. Pullets are not used in the regular breeding pens.

"BIGNESS" PART OF EVERY AMERICAN

"Cult" Began With the Birth of the Nation.

The old-fashioned American "cult of bigness" is the latest subject to attract the attention of the historians, scientists and scholars. Sherwood Anderson thinks that a "tremendous advance" would occur in American civilization "if people tried to be little instead of big," he says in the Woman's Home Companion.

"This notion that anyone in America can be President, that anyone can be a millionaire and that all men are created free and equal, has done more damage than good. I would rather be loved a bit in my small home town than be famed the world over."

Arguing on the other side, an equally eminent authority is quoted as saying: "One would suppose that this doctrine of Mr. Anderson's would be popular, as most of us perforce remain through all our lives little people and known to but a few nearby. But Mr. Anderson speaks in vain, for what he speaks against is no mere notion; it is a doctrine. The cult of bigness is planted deep in American soil. Our pioneers sailed here over a vast sea and plunged into forests so wide and dense that as James Truslow Adams has said, 'a squirrel might have leaped from bough to bough for a thousand miles and never seen the ground.' Their sons ferried over broad rivers, crossed mighty plains and scaled mountain ranges that seemed impassable. They and their sons in turn found in the plains an incredible fertility, in the mountains inexhaustible resources of ores."

Exaggeration, it is pointed out, was dinned into them by Mother Nature herself. "Even the climate, with its swift changes and its far extremes, inspired them to calculate the incalculable. What wonder that their progeny believe that nothing is too big to tackle and, to prove it, devise the most powerful machines and erect the loftiest structures that the world has known. Bigness has become such a blind fetish that a circus bawler can lure people into his sideshows to gaze upon 'the largest midget in the world.'"

Mr. Anderson himself unconsciously reveals by an adjective his own Americanism when he says that through trying to be little Americans would make a "tremendous" advance.

Chinese Leaders Split on Educational Plans

China, unlike most nations, has nothing that can really be called a national sport. Japan, in much the some circumstances, adopted baseball; but baseball in China has never caught on to any great extent. Mission schools and Y. M. C. A.'s, however, have done much to teach forms of sport to elementary and middle school students, with the result that basketball, tennis and football are beginning to prove fairly popular, but only among an extremely small percentage of the nation's many millions of youths. As far as the revival of folklore (which is being considered by the social education department of the ministry of education) is concerned, it is expected that the ministry will encounter difficulties. China is rich in folklore, but while with one hand the government is trying to encourage its revival, with the other hand the government is launching a bitter campaign against superstition. Much of China's ancient folklore deals with supernatural beings, and with historical and mythical characters endowed with supernatural powers. What is needed, according to educational leaders, is the development of a critical faculty among students and the populace which will enable them to disassociate themselves entirely from the million and one popular myths which form the basis of their mental texture, if not of their religious beliefs.

Almighty Dollar Sold

At an auction of antiques in London a United States gold dollar piece bearing the date of 1853 was sold for seven shillings, which is about $1.75 at par. "Oh, no!" said the auctioneer when somebody bid five shillings for the coin. "The sovereign is up seven shillings. Surely the almighty dollar is worth more than that."

HEAD ACHE

THE woman who lets headaches upset her plans must have her eyes and ears closed to certain facts about aspirin. There is always swift comfort, and never any harm, in genuine aspirin tablets that bear the Bayer cross. Doctors have said so; men and women everywhere have found it so. Any headache—from any cause—is always relieved by one or two tablets. And lots of other aches and pains. Neuralgia. Neuritis. Rheumatism. Nagging pains. The pain from colds which make you "ache all over." Sore throat. Systemic or "muscular" pain. Bayer Aspirin can spare you lots of needless suffering! Just be sure you get the genuine.

BAYER ASPIRIN

Names in Odd Sequence

A curious sequence of names is puzzling University of Alabama professors. In one freshman class John James and James John occupy seats near each other. Across the aisle are Jacob Jacobs and Roger Rogers. Three Bernard Cohens are signed up for the same course also. That problem was solved by placing the Cohens on different schedules.

Little Difference

The young bride was asked what she thought of married life.

"Oh, there's not much difference," she replied. "I used to wait up half the night for George to go, and now I wait up half the night for him to come home."

Why Worry?

WHEN you lose your appetite—not only for food . . . but for work and play—don't merely go on worrying. Do something about it!

One of the most famous tonics for weakness, "nerves," and "run down condition," is Fellows' Syrup. It stimulates appetite. Lifts the entire bodily tone to higher levels of vigor and energy. The first few doses will prove that "Fellows" is the medicine for "building up." That is why so many doctors prescribe it. Ask your druggist for genuine

Mattson-Thompson

A wedding of local interest took place at Newfolden last night when Miss Gunda J. Mattson, only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Mattson of Rosewood became the bride of Clayton T. Thompson, a son of Mr. and Mrs. A. O. Thompson of Holt. Miss Ann Evenson acted as the bridesmaid and Arthur Thompson as best man.

At the wedding the bride was attired in an ankle length light blue dress adorned with crystal beads, and with light colored footwear. The groom wore a suit of navy blue serge.

The newlyweds will during the summer months remain at the home of the grooms parents, on their large farm southwest of Holt, and where Clayton will have charge of farming operation and assist his father with his dairy herd. No further plans have been disclosed, and no wedding trip will be undertaken until after the rush of spring work is over.

Mr. and Mrs. Thompson will give to their many friends this place and Rosewood a wedding dance at the Community Hall here on Saturday evening. The community extends congratulations.

Send us the news.

Mr. and Mrs. Halger Hougaard and family of Strandquist visited at the O. J. Backlund and the Marvin Sandberg homes on Sunday.

4-H Club News

The Holt 4-H Club met at the Sunnyside School on Friday evening last week. Mr. Harrison of Warren and Mr. Loven of Holt each gave an interesting talk: A program committee consisting of Stilaf Anderson, Marlan Augustine and Melvin Larson were elected.

A very large crowd attended.

Editors Note:

Why we believe in the 4-H Club movement. Four-H Club work educates us along farm lines and teaches us that to succeed in anything we must understand it. Some boys and girls earn money through club work to go to school. It teaches good sportsmanship. It gives one worthwhile friends. It teaches one to cooperate with his fellows. Having education or a real desire for it, good sportsmanship, true friends, and the spirit of co-operation, is all that one should need to succeed in any profession.

Death of Mrs. Willie Rux

The people of this community were shocked on Monday to hear of the death of Mrs. Willie Rux. Mrs. Rux had been sick a few days with a cold which turned into pneumonia and she failed on Sunday in spite of the fact that they had a doctor and two nurses there all day. She passed away from suffering and pain at 7:40 o'clock Sunday evening.

She leaves her husband and four small children to mourn her loss. Mrs. Rux was a kind hearted woman, a good mother and helpmeet. The sympathy of the entire community goes out to the family that was left to bear the sorrow.

Funeral rites were conducted here yesterday from the Nazareth Lutheran church at 2 p. m., with Rev. Redal officiating.

Interment was made in the Holt cemetery with the Carlson Mercantile Co. having charge of all the arrangements.

School Notes

HIGH SCHOOL

The Biology class has been working with the angleworm in the Laboratory.

The Modern History class is busy reviewing.

The high school honor roll for the six weeks just passed is as follows: Stilof Anderson, Margaret Davis, Esther Doran, Ruby Hall, Eunice Lindholm, Clara Sandberg, Gladys Sanoden, Frederick Voth.

6th, 7th & 8th GRADES

Honor Roll:

Sixth: Lorraine Engebretson, Opal Sanoden, Lowell Sovde.

Seventh: Eleanor Peterson, Gertrude Nohre.

Eighth: Thelma Kolden, Clayton Gunheim.

3rd, 4th & 5th GRADES

The fourth grade children made up poems in Language class one day. These were the best:

SPRING

The birds are singing all the day
We hear them when we are at play.
We see them flying in the sky,
We see them low, we see them high.
—Vernice Tollefsrud.

APRIL SHOWERS

1. When the rain goes pitter patter
To the houses the children scatter.
Through the window they watch it rain
As it patters on the pane.
2.
When the rain stops out they go,
Some fast and some slow.
They have lots of fun and are gay
They play till the end of the day.
—Eleanor Haukeness.

SPRING IS HERE

1. Spring is here! Spring is here!
And we are all full of cheer.
Birds are coming back
In a great big pack.
2. Birds are coming back from the south.
They fly so much they have to rest.
They get so tired
But they try to do their best.
—Milton Hanson.

The fifth grade children also made up some poems. These are the best:

SPRING

Wild flowers are peeping out,
And there are robins all about.
Hear the rain come pitter-patter
On the roof it will clatter.

THE VIOLET

Little violets jump up to say,
"I hope it will be nice today."
Foe you see, the violets get quite cold,
At least that is what I've been told.

WHAT DOES SPRING BRING?

What does spring bring?
The birds, the bees and everything.
The robins, the bluebirds and all the rest,
I really think they are the best.
—Opal Werner.

SPRING

When crows are here,
Spring is near,
They fly about every year
Among the trees far and near.
—Clara Hoffman.

1st & 2nd GRADES

Lois and Betty Louise were the only second grade children who had 100 in Spelling on Friday.

We are working on our Spring border in Art class.

This week we are going to work on our garden. We have gotten some small rakes, hoes and shovels to work with.

Mud Lake Rambles

Mr. and Mrs. C. L. Simmons and family, Bertha Moberg and Rendahl Sannes were Friday visitors at the John Moberg home at Gatzke.

Deloros and Walter Moberg, Andy Olson, Olat and Ole Tweet were visitors at the Knute Nelson home Tuesday evening.

George Moberg and Claude Simmons visited with Leo and Bill Karst Friday evening.

Mrs. C. Sannes and sons, Bill and Leo Karst, George, Lydia and Deloros Moberg, and Edry Leiran were Sunday visitors at the C. L. Simmons home.

George Moberg hauled a truck load of sheep down to the Mike Leiran home Saturday evening. Arnold Sannes and Edry Leiran accompanied him down there.

Edry Leiran has been helping with the farm work at the H. Moberg home the past week.

H. Moberg, John Benitt, and Ole Larson made a trip to Mahnomen on Sunday.

Mr. and Mrs. L. Sagstuen and family, Mr. and Mrs. H. Moberg and sons and daughters took in the 4-H Club meeting held at the Sunnyside schoolhouse Friday evening.

Clarence Doran visited over the week end with home folks.

Mr. and Mrs. L. Sagstuen were callers at the John Moberg home at Gatzke Thursday.

Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Wahlin of Middle River, Edry Leiran and Walter Moberg were short callers at the L. Sagstuen home Thursday evening.

Rendahl Sannes and Bertha Moberg were short callers at the H. Moberg home Saturday evening.

Had Bad Chimney Fire

Mr. and Mrs. T. J. Ness came near losing their home here on Thursday evening when they had a bad chimney fire which burned thru the old brick chimney and set fire to a partition wall in the house. The two old folk were able to put out the fire but, until it had ruined the old chimney and damaged the walls.

John Hagberg is now busy at work repairing the house and building a new chimney.

Mrs. H. O. Hanson has been on the sick list the past week.

Harry Engen has rigged up a saw mill and expects to start sawing a little lumber soon.

A family from Council Bluffs, Iowa who were making the trip from that place to International Falls by team and covered wagon, stopped here a few days to rest their horses.

"Number 53"

This issue is Number 53, the first of its kind in the history of this paper. About once every 7 years, we get 53 Fridays in a year—1932 being a case in point. In order to keep the beginning of each newspaper volume in the first week in May, we have to tack on an extra issue at 7-year intervals, or we would soon get behind the times.

Help Us Help Our Community

"In the great war," says President Hoover, "our people gave their undivided energies to the national purpose. Today we are engaged in a war against depression. If our people will give now the same service and the confidence to our government and our institutions, the same unity and solidarity of courageous action which they gave in the great war, we can overcome this situation."

We are doing our "bit"—lending one citizen's money to another—helping develop our community and our help is limited only by the amount of money deposited with us.

"TARGET KEPT US FROM GOING BEHIND!!"

"I'VE got a warm feeling for Target Tobacco, though I don't happen to be a smoker myself.

"My husband switched to Target from ready-mades. He thought he wasn't going to like rolling his own. But now he says he'd never smoke any other kind. He tells me that Target is real cigarette tobacco, a blend of Virginia, Burley and Turkish tobaccos just like the ready-mades use. And he says that with those gummed papers you get free with Target, it's easy to roll a firm, round cigarette.

"I'll take my husband's word for all that, but I do know that we save real money every week. My husband rolls thirty or more cigarettes from each package of Target. And that means a big saving. Figure it out. Target is only 10 cents a package."

AND GET THIS: The U. S. Government tax on 20 cigarettes amounts to 6¢. On 20 cigarettes you roll from Target Tobacco the tax is just about 1¢. No wonder you get such value for a dime!

How One Woman Lost 10 Lbs. in a Week

Mrs. Betty Luedeke of Dayton writes: "I am using Kruschen to reduce weight—I lost 10 pounds in one week and cannot say too much to recommend it."

To take off fat easily, SAFELY and HARMLESSLY—take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen in a glass of hot water in the morning before breakfast—it is the safe way to lose unsightly fat and one bottle that lasts 4 weeks costs but a trifle. Get it at any drugstore in America. If this first bottle fails to convince you this is the safest way to lose fat—money back.

But be sure and get Kruschen Salts—imitations are numerous and you must safeguard your health.

TREASURES FORGOTTEN IN HOTELS BY GUESTS

Absent-Minded Forget Jewelry, Coats, False Teeth.

Chicago.—It is not the typically absent-minded professor type, but the hustling business man or salesman who most often leave articles ranging from new shirts to false teeth in his hotel room when he departs. Chief house detectives of large Chicago hotels are responsible for that information.

The assistant manager of one hotel, who is also chief of its house officers and has been for several years, reports a list of articles found in hotel rooms which includes bass drums, large-sized radios, swords and jewelry.

A diamond ring valued at $12,000 was left in a hotel room by a woman who was so forgetful she could not remember where she left it. After writing to hotels throughout the country she got in touch with the hotel here and her ring was returned.

Sets of false teeth and odd single teeth are often found in rooms after guests leave. At one hotel it was said that many sets of false teeth are held for months without ever being called for by their owners.

A fine gold watch was left at another hotel. It was inside a pillow case and was not seen by the maid. She tossed the bed linen down a soiled clothes chute, and as the laundry does not touch linens by hand, the watch went through all the washing machinery. There was little left when it was discovered.

Some women guests who have three or four fur coats have left sable, mink, and other valuable coats in their rooms. A horn was found once. Convention delegates who bring fancy dress uniforms and gird on their swords for parade, often leave their swords.

Pajamas, slippers and shaving apparatus was most commonly left. Watches are frequently left by busy salesmen. Often a man leaves a pair of old slippers on purpose. They are held 90 days if not called for. Men sometimes send for an old worn-out pair of bedroom slippers because they have formed an attachment for them. On a rainy day a dozen or more umbrellas will be found in the lobby alone.

Women are the worst for writing back to recover articles they have left. They will write back for a handkerchief, for a toothbrush, and an old one at that, for face creams and lace collars.

Seventy per cent of the persons who are forgetful get in touch with the hotels to recover their property. Telephone calls to inquire if an article of jewelry or some other treasured possession had been found, have been received from San Francisco, New York and all parts of the country.

Entirely sober business men will dash out of the hotel madly, forgetting their suitcase filled with all their belongings, and wire from another city to have it sent on.

A man may buy some new shirts and leave them instead of his old ones, or he may leave the old ones on purpose—in which case they are retained the full time. Articles of sentimental value, such as photographs, letters, or an old hat some one has formed a fondness for, occasionally are the objects of frantic search by the person who forgot them until he locates what hotel he has left them in.

Famed Dartmouth Indian Changes His Feather

Hanover, N. H.—After two years' research by a Dartmouth graduate, that college's Indian symbol is now believed to be historically correct.

The Indian has always been to Dartmouth what the bulldog is to Yale or the tiger to Princeton. The standard Dartmouth Indian invariably has been portrayed as wearing an elaborate feathered headdress.

Walter Beach Humphrey, Dartmouth '11, widely known artist, found that the elaborate headdress was associated with Redskins of the western plains, such as the Sioux, whereas the eastern Indian connected with the college's early history was of the Mohegan type.

So now the Dartmouth Indian, Moheganlike, is pictured with a solitary feather dangling from a topknot of hair.

Briton Perfects World's Strongest Searchlight

London.—A searchlight generating 3,000,000,000 candle power and throwing forth such light as would make reading possible six miles away, has been perfected by Maj. J. C. Savage. This searchlight, which is undergoing tests by the war office, will have the effect of making invasion by enemy airplanes an impossibility. It throws a gird of light into the sky, immediately giving visibility to the aircraft and at the same time providing a means of arriving at a range by which antiaircraft guns could fire at the raider.

Early Horseback Riders Disdained the Saddle

Ancient Greeks rode bareback or used a saddlecloth. Even the saddlecloth does not appear to have been used until the Fifth century. Xenophon says that the saddlecloth had been adopted by the Athenian cavalry, and from his advice as to the seat to be adopted pads or rolls seem to have been added. There were no stirrups until the time of the Emperor Maurice, 602. On a funeral monument of the time of Nero, in the museum at Mainz, is the figure of a horseman on a saddlecloth with something resembling the pommel and cantle of a saddle, but the first saddle proper is found in the so-called column of Theodosius at Constantinople, usually ascribed to the end of the Fourth century A. D., though it may be more than 100 years earlier.

In medieval times the saddle was much like that of the oriental saddle of today. In the military saddle of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth centuries the high front parts were armored. The side-saddle is said to date from the end of the Twelfth century.

Takes Seventeen Years for Locust to Mature

The 17-year locusts, as the insect known to science as the cicada is called, appears in the North more often than every 17 years, but this is due to the fact that there are several cycles of them in existence. The cicadas actually require 17 years to mature from the egg stage to the final stage of the full-grown insect. In the South the period is about four years shorter.

The adults lay the eggs in slits in the bark of twigs of trees. When the eggs hatch, the young is a nymph with legs, but no wings. They drop from the tree to the ground and, burrowing beneath the soil, reach the roots, where they find their sustenance during the years they are progressing toward maturity.

When the 17 years have been accomplished they work to the surface, and their shell coating splits, permitting the full-grown insect to emerge.

PRESIDENT'S PARDON MAKES COUPLE HAPPY

Resume Honeymoon Halted by Immigration Laws.

Chicago.—An interrupted honeymoon was resumed recently. A bride returned to her policeman husband, and three motherless children found a new mother, when President Herbert Hoover gave a personal and unconditional pardon to Mrs. Joseph Killian, nee Stefania Poczatko, stranded for eight months in Windsor, Can.

Red tape, precedent, passports and charges of falsification and moral turpitude figured largely in the romantic story which has just come to its happy ending.

Last August Policeman Joseph P. Killian thought he had settled all the difficulties his fiancee encountered through her illegal entrance into the United States.

He married her, with permission of Secretary of Labor William N. Doak and took her honeymooning to Canada that she might re-enter the country as the wife of an American citizen and a legitimate citizen in her own right.

But the Department of Labor slipped a cog, decided that Stefania herself was responsible for the errors on her passport and Stefania was ordered to remain outside the country.

So she found herself stranded in a cheap boarding house in Windsor for eight months, during which she wrote adoring letters to her husband and dreamed of the things they could do for his three youngsters, the oldest just six.

And then the hand of the President scrawled a full pardon to exonerate the exiled young bride and restored her to her adopted home.

Stefania, at last has returned to her home and her husband. Uncle Sam has a new citizen and three little babes a new mother.

Quake Expert Studies Earth in Buried Vault

Santa Clara, Calif.—In a concrete vault 20 feet below ground on the University of Santa Clara campus, Dr. Albert J. Newland, disciple of the late Father Jerome Ricard, Jesuit "padre of the rains," conducts his "earthquake factory."

Every night for 25 years Doctor Newland has descended the narrow passage to the tomblike chamber, bolted the single, narrow door of the vault, and kept his vigil with the earth's quiverings and temblors.

Within the vault's 2-foot concrete walls, Doctor Newland checks the earth's tremblings, the expansion and contraction of its surface due to cold spells, heat waves, other causes. These are recorded by the "light pencils."

Doctor Newland's "earthquake factory" is buried deep in the ground so that surface vibration will not affect its delicate instruments. The seismographs, firmly lodged on a concrete pier, record the nature, location, and time of occurrence of disturbances.

American Rackets Reach London and Cause Worry

London.—American rackets often take a long time to get here, but they arrive eventually.

Theater managers right now are alarmed at the operations of strangers, who have begun selling tickets above the box office prices to those waiting in line outside. It has been done here before, but never on the scale of the scalpers who "work" the New York theaters and the world series baseball games.

Whereas the American scalper would scorn to handle tickets selling for less than $5. London's scalpers deal in three shilling pasteboards.

The chief difference between English and American racketeers seems to be that the former work alone rather than in gangs. Blackmailing is extensive, and recently several bold entrepreneurs have undertaken to sell "protection" to various trades—sabotage being the alternative, of course.

One instance was that of a fish merchant, who supplied a large hotel and who refused to buy "protection." He lost his contract with the hotel because, it was stated, his fish had not been up to standard. Later he discovered that the fish had been kept for several days before being cooked and otherwise tampered with.

Where Does She Get Her "Pep?"

SHE doesn't look seventy. Nor feel that old. The woman who stimulates her organs can have energy that women half her age will envy!

At middle-age your vital organs begin to slow down. You may not be sick, simply sluggish. But why endure a condition of half-health when there's a stimulant that will stir a stagnant system to new life and energy in a week's time?

This remarkable stimulant is perfectly harmless. It is, in fact, a family doctor's prescription. So, if you're tired of trying every patent medicine that comes along, tell the druggist you want a bottle of Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin. Take a bit of this delicious syrup every day or so, until you know by the way you feel that your lazy liver is again active, and your bowels are poison-free.

Men, women, and children who are run-down, who tire easily, get bilious spells or have frequent headaches, are soon straightened out when they get this prescriptional preparation of pure pepsin, active senna, and fresh laxative herbs. (Syrup pepsin is all the help the bowels need, and you do not form the very bad habit of always taking cathartics.)

Keep a bottle of Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin in the house, and take a stimulating spoonful every now and then. It is all that a great many people ever take to keep strong and vigorous, and absolutely free from constipation.

Supplying Sponge Demand

Sponge production is centered in two localities—the Mediterranean and the Gulf of Mexico and West Indies. The Mediterranean fisheries are a little the larger. These are exploited chiefly by Greeks, but to some extent by all the Mediterranean nationalities. Americans do harvest sponges, and in the western hemisphere the output of two Florida fields is the most valuable. One field is off Tampa bay, the other around Key West. The Bahamas and Cuba produce most of the West Indian sponges.

For 100% Health

THERE is something vibrant and magnetic about the truly healthy man or woman, who is satisfied and contented with life. That "something" attracts people. Wins confidence. Arouses and holds affection.

This vitality and enthusiasm of youth are priceless. Guard them with Fellows' Syrup, the fine old tonic which doctors recommend. It restores and strengthens. Improves appetite. You sleep better and feel better. Your vigor and endurance return. For just one week, try genuine Fellows' Syrup, which you can get at your druggist's. The results will amaze and delight you.

FELLOWS' SYRUP

MEDUSA'S HEAD

By Josephine Daskam Bacon

Copyright by D. Appleton and Company (WNU Service)

SYNOPSIS

In concern over the disappearance of the young and beautiful wife of his wealthy friend, Crandall White, Aaron Glaenzer engages Motherwell, private investigator, to find her. A note from the missing woman warns her husband not to call in the police, saying she "hoped to come back." Mrs. White is younger than her husband, and his devotion has been the talk of New York. Her leaving him is unexplainable. She is known to have with her a remarkable jewel, the "Medusa's Head," but her maid, Coggeshall, thinks she had little else of value. It is found that Mrs. White has all her jewelry with her. Coggeshall talks mysteriously of her mistress being "worried." Through an advertisement Motherwell secures the Medusa's head, which, he is told, an "old woman" had thrown out of a cab. From the finder he gets a clew which sends him to the office of Doctor Wentzel, consulting chemist. Wentzel is away, but from a clerk Motherwell secures a package which he recognizes as coming from the White home.

"Receipt?" Motherwell cried in vexation. "Why should I have a receipt? We were to go over it together. I can't wait a moment. We must have the report today!"

The youth picked up the box, balancing it scornfully.

"Not even an address!" he said. "That's a neat looking package, isn't it? That's a nice responsibility! What's it a specimen of? Lead? What's your name, anyhow?"

"My name is Wells," said Motherwell, his eyes snapping, "and it's a piece of onyx. It's from Glaenzer and Company. Call Mr. Glaenzer right up and get it O. K'd, if you want, but for heaven's sake give it to me—I must get somebody else to test it, that's all."

The youth whistled.

"Well, you can search me!" he said doubtfully. "Let's have a look at it. Glaenzer, you say?"

He took out a pocket knife, poked through the tissue wrapping, and disclosed a veined, milky inch of onyx, with a gold rim just edging out.

"I guess you win," he said, "give me a receipt for it, will you? There can't be two of 'em. And the name again, will you?"

Motherwell wrote, and thrust the box under his arm carelessly.

"Where is this laboratory?" he asked suddenly. "I'd like to have a try at the professor, myself."

"I'll bet you would!" the youth agreed sardonically. "But you won't! Nor anybody else. He's not to be disturbed, he isn't."

Motherwell sighed.

"Oh, well, all right," he said. Then his face lightened. "Hasn't he got an assistant or something?" he asked hopefully, "couldn't I see him?"

"You mean Doctor Schaffner?"

"Dark," said Motherwell suggestively, "with a beard. . . ."

"Lord, no! This one's sandy-haired and a little mustache. He's working with him now. A lot of people want him, too. I'll tell you. Schaffner's got a dinner date at Brucca's—know that Italian place? You might catch him there. Try it, anyhow."

"Thanks, I will," said Motherwell, "and er, were you here Wednesday morning? I didn't see you."

"No, sir, you did not," said the youth promptly, "because I wasn't here. It was Wednesday noon that Old Pretzels sicked me on this job. That's when he dashed off, swearing like a steam engine. Some of his messes went back on him, you see. The woman that cleans up the little lab in there nearly fainted when she saw the broken glass and the mess. He's not been in, since. Oh, gosh, there's that phone again!"

Motherwell went slowly down the stairs.

"Now, why did Coggeshall lie about that paperweight?" he asked softly of the taxi cab he sat in. "Did she come for it? Then why not ask for it, outright. Or was she looking for the Medusa? Or did she throw the Medusa away, herself? Nonsense: the woman who stole it threw it away. And kept the rest, of course. She didn't dare keep it—knew it would be identified. Because Coggeshall is shielding her madam—she'd keep the Medusa, if anything. Didn't even ask for her—unless madam called herself 'Mrs Gray.' But if Coggeshall knew that name, then she knew the whole plan from the beginning, and lied all along. Besides, that woman in the cab wasn't young. Did they fool her on the jewels, and give her only the Medusa?

"Well, here's the paperweight and there's where she went, any way. Now let's look up Old Pretzels!"

Sitting an hour later in his club in front of a chop and a baked apple he was called to the telephone booth and surprised to find himself talking to Mr. Glaenzer himself. No, he had not gone to his old friend, who had begged him to stay in New York. The doctor was with him, and a nurse. Had Mr. Motherwell any further ideas as to the business they had been discussing?

Mr. Motherwell had, and would send Mr. Wells around to see him shortly.

And soon the young man with his bag and shell-rimmed spectacles was in the library of Mr. Glaenzer's city house, and the torn box was on Mr. Glaenzer's knees, and the Medusa in his olive hand.

"You know, you're rather extraordinary, Motherwell!" said the jeweler.

"Only lucky, sir," the young man answered frankly, "really! A child would have followed up that ad in the Herald. The rest just broke my way."

"I was told that things often broke your way," said Mr. Glaenzer. "It seems they do. Who is this Wentzel?"

"Perfectly all right, sir, as far as I can find—He's a Swiss. Alsatian. Stands very high. He worked out some explosives, during the war, and they had him up before the war board for one or two formulas, of which one was just about to be used when the armistice was signed. He's very strong on anilines, and coal-tar products generally. He's a member of the Chemical Engineers club and has lectured at Columbia. Has a laboratory in Jersey. They've got his whole record."

"You're sure she went there?"

"Here's the onyx thing Coggeshall tied up, sir. The paper fits absolutely. I think she wrote it there."

"And left this for Coggeshall?"

"Probably. Only she seemed to want a message, not a package. Didn't even take it."

"You think she was 'Mrs. Gray'?"

Motherwell shrugged. "Maybe. But who is the older woman? She's the one we want, sir. She didn't get enough pay, you see. And she was alone. Mrs. White was with some one—some one who was hurrying her."

"And telling her what to say, you think?"

"Absolutely, sir. And making her go."

"You still stick to that, don't you?"

"Yes, sir, I do."

"And yet, Motherwell, what was the hurry? The jewels were all out of the way, before; a very quiet, plain dress was arranged; a taxicab was called, not to use her own car. What is there sudden in all that?"

"Something turned up," said Motherwell.

"Or somebody," said the jeweler.

Motherwell turned on him impatiently.

"There you are, sir!" he cried, "there you are! You see, you've got this all clear in your mind—I know you can't help it, but you have. And you can't really think, you see. You've got a complete picture."

"What do you mean?" the older man asked shortly.

"Why, excuse me, sir, but it's so clear what you think!"

"What do I think?"

Motherwell sighed impatiently.

"See here," he said. "Here's a girl. Married at what—twenty-two—twenty-one? That's near enough. All accounted for since then, and, perhaps, from when she got to Paris. Perhaps before. But a lot can happen to a girl before she's twenty-one. Before she's nineteen. Before she's eighteen. Well, suppose it's happened, happened and forgotten.

"Now, here she is, happy and secure. Brilliantly secure. Everything going her way. And then—the old story. It turns up. Or, of course, he turns up. A lover? Perhaps. A husband? Maybe. Maybe she thought he was dead. Maybe—in prison. Oh, yes—it happens, you know!

"Now, in that case, it's blackmail, or it's just plain principle—principle and conscience—or it's sheer funk. Of course, everything she has she'll give up. But maybe that's not enough. Maybe he just wants her, and there's no bribe at all."

The jeweler's mobile face stopped him. "I tell you, yes!" the young man cried, "men are that way about women! It's happened! Anyway, she went. And didn't want to. Because she hoped to come back. That is, according to you, she wants to eat her cake and have it, too! And all you want to know, now, is, how much he'll take? Isn't that so?"

Glaenzer threw up his hands.

"I'm afraid it is," he said softly, "I'm afraid it is! And can you see any other picture, you extraordinary boy?"

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

"Blooding" a Building

A strange primal belief still exists in England, in the superstition that any new building will be unsafe or unlucky unless human or animal blood be spilt on it before completion. Not long ago a workman fell from the top of Stratford-on-Avon's lofty new Shakespeare theater, and was killed, whereupon one of his fellow-workmen remarked: "That will save blooding the new building." Being questioned, he explained that if no one met with an accident, shedding blood during the erection, it was customary to kill some small animal on the site, to ensure the building's future safety.

First Apple Dumpling

It is said to have been George III who asked how the apple got inside the dumpling. Here, then, is the true story of its origin, as related in Norfolk. It goes like this: Once upon a time there was a worthy Norfolk farmer who had a pretty Norfolk wife. He compared her cheeks with apples. He asserted fondly that he would like to eat them. "So you shall," replied the wife. "Wait until tomorrow." And when the morrow came she set before him the father of all apple dumplings. So the farmer laughed hugely and gave the rosy rogue a groat with which to buy ribbons at the next fair.

IDEA OF ARMORED VESSELS IN 1861

Naval Officials Quick to See Possibilities.

One of those interesting minor notes on naval history was supplied in a Lowell lecture at Boston when Professor Baxter, of Harvard, traced from a re-examination of the original documents, the development of the navy's ironclad program at the beginning of the Civil war—a program of which the Monitor was merely the most celebrated product.

Mr. Baxter, according to the Boston Transcript, has annihilated the charge of obstructive traditionalism sometimes leveled at the Navy department in connection with the Monitor. Capt. Liddell Hart's dictum that war offices always begin a war at a point somewhat behind that which they had reached at the end of the preceding one apparently did not apply to the navy in 1861. Even before the fall of Sumter the navy was considering the first of a flood of proposals for the construction of ironclad men-of-war, and the chief of the bureau of construction and repair was soon to advocate not one but a whole fleet of these radical innovations.

Many people—Donald McKay, the creator of the great clipper ships, was one—were advocating armored vessels, and the idea of turret mountings for the guns had already been advanced by a British naval officer the year before. The Navy department went to work in a methodical fashion suggestive of World war days; it convened a board which studied the proposals and by September was able to recommend three different types for experimental construction. One of them was the especially radical Monitor. She had the luck first to meet the test of battle and to pass it magnificently, and after that the construction of the large fleet of double-turreted monitors went on rapidly. The navy was able to take the very latest ideas available, study them, adopt and test models and then go into "quantity production" for the winning of the war.

The story is not without its modern application. It is an earlier instance of the "time lag" essential in the development of any new weapon for war service—a phenomenon recently pointed out by a British writer, Victor Lefebure, as a possible means for arriving at scientific disarmament systems. Another point is the fact that the navy, even with this prompt and intelligent handling of the situation, got what was actually rather a poor weapon as the result of the hastes of working under war pressure.

The Monitor's victory in her one battle was to influence our naval construction down to Spanish war days; actually, however, the raft idea, which was Ericsson's essential contribution, was not a sound one. The turret stayed, but the raft was not copied in other navies and finally disappeared in our own. But mistakes are unavoidable when a new type has to be built in large numbers all at once.—New York Herald Tribune.

Economic Leaders Will Speak on Newspaper Hour

Outstanding economic problems of the day will be discussed in the National Farm and Home Hour Saturday, April 30, by L. A. Downs, president of the Illinois Central railroad, Benjamin M. Anderson, Jr., economist of the Chase National bank of the city of New York, and United States Senator Otis F. Glenn of Illinois.

The broadcast will be under the direction of the corn belt farm dailies, a group of daily agricultural newspapers which circulate principally among the larger producers of live stock. In the group are the Chicago Drovers Journal, Kansas City Drovers Telegram, Omaha Journal-Stockman, and St. Louis Daily Livestock Reporter.

Charles E. Snyder, editor of the Chicago Drovers Journal, will be in charge of the broadcast and will introduce the speakers who are to devote their attention to presenting for the farm radio audience discussions of existing economic conditions of the day.

The program promises to attract the attention of vast audiences particularly because it will bring before the NBC microphones three distinguished leaders in the economic world.

The program will be brought to listeners as part of the plan to feature the messages of practically every important agricultural organization in the country. The speakers were chosen by Mr. Snyder because of their long experience and contacts with our economic problems

To every mother who can't nurse her baby... NEWS!

When a mother's milk fails, nothing is more important than this—to be sure that the food that goes into her baby's bottle gives him just what he needs to make him rosy and healthy now, and build him a firm foundation for future health.

Test made with fifty babies

Recently, two physicians—specialists in baby diet—conducted a test with fifty average babies, to throw new light on this subject.

The food tested is one unique in infant feeding history. Next to mother's milk, it has raised more babies than any other food in the world. Over a period of 75 years, it has given millions their start in life. Throughout America, there are healthy babies, children, grown-ups, to prove the value of this amazingly digestible food.

Yet never before had scientists put this famous food—Eagle Brand Milk—to such a thorough, controlled, scientific test. What would such a test reveal?

Simple diet proves builder of 100% babies

For months, the two physicians fed those fifty babies on Eagle Brand—checking with closest care every detail of their health and growth. Bone structure was studied with the X-ray. Tooth development was watched. Weight and height were periodically recorded. Blood tests were made . . .

And those fifty Eagle Brand babies, judged by every known test, proved themselves splendidly nourished. This simple diet—Eagle Brand, with merely the usual supplementary foods—had proved equal to the building of a 100% baby.*

Now, science joins the millions of mothers who say, "We have our proof that Eagle Brand Milk is a truly valuable and effective food for a baby."

If you cannot nurse your baby, try Eagle Brand. Easy to prepare—merely add boiled water. Always pure, safe, free from dangerous germs. Keeps indefinitely in any climate. Simple feeding directions are on the label.

*The usual supplementary foods, of course, are orange or tomato juice, and cod-liver oil or other source of the anti-rachitic Vitamin D.

Bentley Nelson In Accident

Word was received here on Tuesday that Bently Nelson of Grand Forks was hurt Sunday nite in an auto smashup in that city. He was riding with his nephew, Myron Adams, in a Ford coupe owned by Adams when they collided with another car on a street in the city.

Mr. Nelson was put in a hospital where it was found that he had some broken ribs and other injuries but, according to his relatives here he is getting along pretty well. Mr. Adams escaped with only a few scratches. Both cars were smashed beyond repair.

Child Health Day

The first of May, by act of Congress and by Proclamation from the President of the United States, is now recognized as Child Health Day.

The boys and girls of today are the citizens of the coming decade, and we must look to them for the future of this country. We want all our children to have all possible advantages in health, living conditions and education. The responsibility for the well-being of children rests not only in the individual, but in the community as well.

The Child Hygiene Divison of the Minnesota Department of Health is directing the program for the observance of the Child Health Day in Minnesota. As Governor of the State, I urge all the people of Minnesota, especially those engaged in public and private welfare work, to cooperate in the fulfillment of this program.

Band Concert To Be Held Here May 20

We have from time to time mentioned something about our local band which was organized here last fall with only a few members. Now we are proud to announce that the band has progressed steadily and has a membership of thirty local business men and farmers taking part.

The band will give an indoor concert in the Holt school auditorium Friday night May 20, and we assure you that your time and money used in coming in to hear the boys will be well spent.

They are making an admission charge of 20 cents for children and 35 cents for adults. This money will be used to pay for the big new Sousaphone they purchased a short time ago.

The managers announce however that as soon as weather permits the band will give free outdoor concerts here.

Give the local boys your support for this first concert. They have put in a lot of hard work to create such a fine organization, and it is now up to the public to show their appreciation of the fact.

Buy your tickets now from any one of the band members.

IN MEMORIAM

Gilbert Johnson — In loving memory of our beloved, who passed away one sad year ago May 9, 1931.

In a graveyard softly sleeping,
Lies the one we love so dearly,
In his silent, lonely grave;
Peaceful be your sleep, dear daddy,
It is sweet to breathe your name,
In life we loved you dearly,
In death we do the same.
Just one sad year ago you left us,
Now we miss you, daddy dear,
As we drop a silent tear,—
You shall never be forgotten,
Never from our memory fade,
Loving hearts will always linger
Around the grave where you are laid.

Sadly missed by Mrs. Clara Johnson and children.

Make up your mind now to plant a tree in honor of George Washington in this year of Bicentennial Celebration.

Mud Lake Rambles

Arnold Sannes, Mrs. C. L. Simmons, and Lydia Moberg were callers in Thief River Falls Tuesday.

Mrs. C. Sannes and son Rendahl were short visitors at the H Moberg home Wednesday evening.

The printer made a mistake in the last Mud Lake Rambles. It said "George Moberg and Claude Simmons visited with Leo and Bill Karst Friday evening." It was Rendahl and Arnold Sannes and Claude Simmons who visited with the Karst boys; and George Moberg and Claude Simmons made a trip to Karlstad on Sunday after a load of spuds.

Lydia Moberg visited with Mr. and Mrs. O. L. Johnson in Holt on Monday.

Beauty A Town Asset

In spite of the apparent commercialism of the age in which we live, it is evident to any observer that the American people are rapidly developing a greater appreciation of the beautiful. This is not confined to only the wealthier classes, but extends to the great masses in the tows and villages and in rural districts.

Beautiful cities, towns and villages attract people. They attract permanent residents, they attract tourists, and the attract trade. It is natural that a person selecting a trade center will choose a town that is beautiful and clean in preference to one that is unsightly and dirty, if other conditions are anywhere near equal.

Therefore, it behooves the authorities of any community as well as each individual citizen, to make the most of their opportunities for improving the appearance of the place in which they live. Beauty and cleanliness are among a town's best assets.

Ancestral Estate Bait Is Still Lure to Yanks

Mythical Fortunes in England Tempt Suckers.

London.—The biggest piece of international bait ever dangled before suckers at home or abroad still finds poor fish who swallow the hook, the line, and the sinker. It's that old morsel—the ancestral estate in England.

Wails go up periodically as demands, appeals, threats, and claims come by letter from the United States to officials in London, putting forward arguments based on the front page of the family Bible and the wheedlings of slick confidence men. Thousands of Jenningses, Blakes, Hydes, and Drakes, not only in the United States but in Canada, Australia, South Africa, and points both east and west believe they have a right to a castle, horses, dogs, vast acres, and piles of money in the bank, but the clever "estate lawyers" who dupe the ignorant into buying shares in such ventures have found most of their victims in America.

Another warning has just been issued by the American consulate general here. It is a typed, single spaced document seven pages long explaining why attempts to recover such estates are mistakes.

"Large unclaimed estates believed by many to exist in England are in practically every instance entirely mythical," says the consul general's memorandum, which is headed "A Warning," "and reports of vast sums 'awaiting claimants in the bank of England' or dormant in the courts of chancery are altogether without foundation.

"The collection of money which, it is claimed, is for the purpose of taking legal proceedings to secure for heirs alleged estates of fabulous value in Great Britain has become almost as established a business as that of selling spurious securities to the uninformed. The consulate general in London receives a number of letters each week, sometimes five or six in one day, with regard to nonexistent estates or estates that have been settled for so many years that no British court will reconsider decisions made, in some cases, more than a century ago."

The statement points out that promoters of these fake schemes for reclaiming supposed estates have sold many "units" for $100 each, and where prospective victims were unable to find that much cash, fractions of units. "Occasionally," it says, "a case is brought before the courts, but the costs are comparatively small and entirely out of proportion to the sums collected as advance fees."

A list enumerating "a few" of the alleged estates about which the consulate is frequently consulted and which actually do not exist was embodied in the statement. They are those of Sir Francis Drake, Hyde, Jennings (Jannigs or Jennens), Patrick Rucker, Hedges, Mosher, Weber (Webber), Duke of Argyle, James Dixon, Helen Sheridan Blake, Lawrence-Townley (Lawrence Townsen), Walmsley, Jaques, Gen. Richard Winn, Bonnet (Bonet), and Page and Green or Greene. The Jennings and the Blake estates are the favorites, and a week seldom passes without receipt of several letters from claimants to these "estates."

"It is a popular error that funds of unclaimed estates are left on deposit in the Bank of England," the memorandum observes. "This institution keeps a record of unclaimed government securities and dividends, and no other kind of unclaimed property."

In general, the consulate general statement advises all persons contemplating such action to consult expert legal opinion first. And it warns that even if unimpeachable evidence of genealogical claims is furnished, the probability is that the estate will prove too small to pay for the suit, even in the event of success.

Norwegians Score as Most Generous Tippers

London. — Scandinavians are the world's most generous tippers, hotel servants say.

A poll among waiters, bellhops, chambermaids and other employees of London's leading hostelries showed Norwegians to be the most welcome guests. Other northern European visitors tipped almost as well.

Spaniards were a good second and Germans not far behind. The French and Italians, however, are considered "tight."

Americans, it was found, could not be classified. They tip extravagantly or hardly ever.

Inventor 'Cracks Up' Plane in Spite of Cops

Cannes.—French police for months have been trying to keep Albert Sauvent from cracking up his airplane—but he foxed them and succeeded.

Sauvent, an inventor, had been prevented from testing his own "crash-proof" airplane. Police watched him closely. But he escaped their vigilance long enough to stage an intentional crack-up.

King Carol's Escapades Are Cause of Army Discontent

Marshal Rebuked as He Pens Hints of Dethronement.

Geneva. — King Carol's uneasy throne shows new symptoms of shakiness, not the least of which is a growing discontent in the Rumanian army.

Reports percolating from Bukharest weeks ago hinted trouble ahead, but a "history parable" published in Bukharest by the fearless, blunt Marshal Averescu said in so many words that Rumania's army no longer gets its pay regularly and is "discontented."

Averescu even hinted at the dethronement of Carol, with the result that members of parliament felt it necessary to rebuke him and give three rousing cheers for the king.

Among diplomats here, however, the marshal's "history parable" was of particular interest because it seemed to confirm reports via Paris that palace intrigue in Bukharest had developed to the point where Prince Nicholas felt duty bound to warn party leaders to "act quickly" if they wanted to save the dynasty.

Nicholas was quoted as saying that Mme. Magda Lupescu and other intimates of the king "control all his actions, and unless halted will surely drive both him and the dynasty to ruin." He is expected to return to Bukharest within a few days.

Besides the flaming-haired Lupescu the chief intriguers included, according to this report, Dumitrescu, the king's private secretary, and a Mme. Wieder, intimate friend of Lupescu. Queen Helene, Carol's divorced wife, visited him and her son, Prince Michael, and a reconciliation was hinted.

Now Marshal Averescu's parable says not a word directly about King Carol. It is merely a series of extracts from historical volumes, all bearing on the sad fate of Prince Alexander Cuza, first ruler of Rumania, who lost his throne in a popular revolution in February, 1866.

"It was just 66 years ago today," writes the marshal, "that Alexandru Ioan Cuza lost the throne of the Rumanian princes."

The veteran then goes on to cite excerpts from this and that historian—excerpts with pat overtones of modern applicability. For instance:

"He failed to restore the country's economic equilibrium. Such measures as he attempted turned out to be directed against certain classes and groups. In addition there were various scandalous affairs, all-too-numerous in his disordered way of life."

1782 Masonic Book Is Valued Relic

Allentown, Pa.—The rites of the Ahiman Reazon of Masonry and a sermon dedicated to George Washington are printed in a volume of Masonic ritual published in 1782 and now a valued heirloom held by Mrs. Ethel Reichard, here.

The book, its pages discolored and dried by the years, was the property of Robert Carr Wilson, the owner's great-grandfather, and was presented him when he became a member of Masonic lodge, No. 2, Philadelphia, second oldest in the United States.

Washington was a member of the Alexandria (Va.) lodge No. 1, the oldest.

The sermon, printed after the ritual, was delivered by Rev. Smith in Christ church, Philadelphia, on December 20, 1779, in the presence of Washington.

A scrawl on the flyleaf bears the name of "Benj. Meredith," but there is no explanation of its significance.

Dream Waltz

❀

By Fannie Hurst

(© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)
(WNU Service)

WHEN Leonard was twenty-one, he composed a dream waltz. It was published, caught on, and for a considerable while the entire land was dancing to it and humming.

Incidentally, it made quite a pile of money for Leonard, enabling him to plan a trip to Greece there to satisfy some sort of a congenital hunger in his middle west soul, to say nothing of the fact that, for at least a six-month, he was quite a celebrity. His home town honored him; even New York bowed to him upon his arrival there to take ship, and for one brief second in his scheme of things, the gods took notice of a lean gangling fellow with a shock of blond hair, who hailed from a town called Granite City, and through whose commonplace looking cranium had wafted the haunting melody of a dream.

Everywhere he went for those few months, the melody went with him, following him like a wisp of lovely smoke. In restaurants, when he entered, the orchestra played him his dream waltz; on dance floors, youth, with drugged looking eyes, moved rhythmically to it. Even on street corners, barrel organs sent his dream waltz tumbling into the street din. They were short, excited melodius months, dominated by the subtle aura of success.

It was in New York, while waiting to take the ship for the Aegean islands, that he met a slip of a girl from Brooklyn endowed with the absurdly incongruous and beautiful name of Hesper. She was a flat-voiced, satin-skinned, colloquial, quick-minded, city-minded, city-turned little piece, one of hordes who milled through the daily scene, but to Leonard, from the moment he clapped eyes on her seated on a high stool beside him at an ice cream counter, a nymph who must have slipped out of the surf of the ocean surrounding Manhattan.

Their courtship was quick, citified and ended in marriage. The trip to the Aegean, of course, was shelved, first because Hesper preferred to purchase furniture with the money and secondly, because any spot she chose to be, became the Aegean isles to Leonard.

They were married on a Monday, had fitted up a pert little filing cabinet of a flat by the following Monday, and in another week were neatly adjusted into a well-oiled routine of the butcher, the baker, the refrigerator defroster; the dumb waiter, the subway, the vermin exterminator.

Nor was the transition of hopes and plans difficult for Leonard. Hesper was more delectable, if possible, in marriage than she had been in courtship. Built like a doll, her quick pink tongue, her darting adorably wayward eye, her flashing little temper, her irresistable remorse were as elusive, as maddening, as appetizing to him, as had been the elusive strains of his waltz before he captured them all.

For a twelve month they lived, these two children, captured into the cave of their Manhattan flat, the deliciously irresponsible, uninhibited lives of playboy and playgirl.

Then the funds gave out, the vogue of the dream waltz began to go the way of all vogues, and life began to become the serious business it can manage to be upon occasion.

What subsequently happened, came much more gradually than it seems in the telling. The first dimming of the luster of the vivaciousness that was Hesper's did not come until those first strangely solemn days when it became necessary for the little household, builded on the dream waltz, to sit solemnly down and take note of its budget. And then, almost before they could catch their breath over the narrow margin of their resources, Hesper's twin girls were born and ten months thereafter, a boy, and ten months after that, another.

Thereupon, this story takes its all too usual course. The gradual conflict of wear and tear, worry and financial strain upon beauty, youth and hope. For almost a year, battling with the haunting desires for melody that still lay tormented in the hinterlands of his mind, Leonard, borrowing, devising, scheming to meet his budget, strove to recapture some of the quality that had poured into the dream waltz.

At the end of fourteen months, he was clerking in a haberdashery. At the end of five years, he was clerking in haberdashery.

With a finality that struck terror to his soul, his house had settled, his Hesper had settled, his routine had settled.

A bitter, slatternly, violently maternal Hesper ruled his household now.

It mattered not that when she met him, Hesper, at ten dollars a week, had been salesgirl in the basement of a department store. The years, piling up their woes and disappointment, also piled up in the wife of Leonard, festering hallucinations of having sacrificed herself.

Strangely, there was no repudiation in Leonard. What Hesper said of him in vituperative moods, was true. He had brought no fulfillment to his marriage. His promise, his inspiration, his melody of spirit, had petered out. Hesper, who thought she had married success, had married a clerk.

It hurt Leonard to see her beauty fade out beneath the lines of bitterness, and to know that the lugging of her heavy children was dragging her figure into sway-back lines.

Even the old struggle for composition was gone. With the enforced sale of his piano, he had for a few months locked himself up evenings to try and strum for melody on a battered guitar. That woke the babies. The slow corroding processes of frustration began to eat into the heart of Leonard.

At forty, gray and with a stoop, he was any morning the strap-hanger caught in the obscene shambles of the subway eight o'clock rush; he was any flat dweller, turning his pasty face homeward at six o'clock, once more a wedged sardine in the evening subway rush; a qualified member of the routinized world of the flat, the shop, the daily grind.

Sunday mornings he wheeled out his babies, cleaned out his pipes, tinkered with a homemade radio, buried his face under sheets of the Sunday papers to escape the perpetual wanglings of Hesper, who wore dust caps and her skirts pulled up around her hips while she did housework.

Sunday afternoons, particularly as his boys began to grow up, he walked with them to the zoos of the public parks or occasionally took them skiff riding on the small lakes. His neck had grown thin, his arms had grown more gangling, his eyes had grown to look like glass that had been breathed on.

Yet withal, the man out of whom had flowered the mystic sweetness of the dream waltz, moved ahead in the trance of his life. Husband of a wife. Father of children. Head of a household. Taxpayer on a tiny scale. Subscriber to a morning newspaper. Tinkerer with his radio. Absorber of the ready-made propaganda of the political and social world in which he lived.

His twins grew older and more demanding and more critical of the parent who had thus thrust them into ways of mediocrity, when at school there were children who came from larger flats, and wore better frocks. His boys grew older, and in many respects, terrifyingly wise in city ways. His wife grew dimmer and more the scold.

And yet, to all intents and purposes, the little family in the usual little flat. In the usual mediocrity of its middle class routine, was fulfilling its destiny. Hesper, the mother, who had given of her body and her vitality that there might be life. Leonard, the provider, who sought to instill within his family, right doing and living. Yearlings, growing into their maturity under the family roof.

Straw-foot, hay-foot! Routine. Mediocrity. Standardization.

At fifty, Leonard, with the unfinished melodies dormant within him, was reconciled to all this. So, in her way, was the querulous Hesper.

And then one night something happened which changed the complexion of life for Leonard to such an extent, that he could never again feel drab and hopeless and trapped by the machinery of his life. A small, almost infinitesimal thing happened, filling his cup to overflowing; making the future something to care about; something to dream about.

His eldest boy, a slender, rather sensitive-faced youngster brought him a drawing he had made on a sheet of paper. A precocious, really extraordinary portrait of a young girl, executed with vitality, imagination and beauty.

Captured into that face on the paper, laid in cunning gifted stroke, line by line, was all the quality that eighteen years before Leonard in another way had poured into the dream waltz. Life was not done!

English Kings Prodigal in Territorial Grants

Under the early charters granted by the English kings to the colonies in the New world, Connecticut was entitled to a sweep of territory as wide as the present width of that state, and extending all the way across the continent. Presently Connecticut's claims came in conflict with grants to New York and Pennsylvania, and these disputes were finally decided in favor of the latter, states. But Connecticut maintained its claims from the western boundary of Pennsylvania until after the Revolutionary war.

The peace terms had given the United States the title to land extending to the Mississippi, but the general government prevailed on the old states to yield to it their peculiar claims on the western lands, so that ultimately these might be organized as new states.

Between 1784 and 1802, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina and Georgia made cessions of western lands. Connecticut ceded the greater part of its claims on September 13, 1786, but retained the title to an area across the northern part of what is now the state of Ohio, running along the shore of Lake Erie west 120 miles from the Pennsylvania border, and extending south to the forty-first parallel of north latitude. This territory soon came to be called "the Connecticut Western Reserve" or simply "The Western Reserve." It comprised the present counties of Ashtabula, Trumbull, Lake, Geauga, Portage, Cuyahoga, Medina, Lorain, Huron and Erie, and the greater part of Summit and the northern parts of Mahoning and Ashland.

In 1800, however, Connecticut finally ceded to the federal government the jurisdiction over the Reserve, which was incorporated with the Northwest territory, and soon afterward was included in the lands which were admitted as the state of Ohio.

Noisy Silence

Paul, who made his home with his grandmother in a large house in the country, missed his older sister while she was at school.

Trying to dispel his loneliness, he resorted to conversation with his grandmother. This had gone on most of the forenoon one day, when his grandmother in desperation asked him:

"Paul, why don't you keep still for a while? You are about to talk me to death."

"Well, grandma," he replied, "when I don't talk, the clock ticks so loud."

Lost 20 Lbs. of Fat In Just 4 Weeks

Mrs. Mae West of St. Louis, Mo., writes: "I'm only 28 yrs. old and weighed 170 lbs. until taking one box of your Kruschen Salts just 4 weeks ago. I now weigh 150 lbs. I also have more energy and furthermore I've never had a hungry moment."

Fat folks should take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water in the morning before breakfast—it's the SAFE, harmless way to reduce as tens of thousands of men and women know.

For your health's sake ask for and get Kruschen at any drugstore—the cost for a bottle that lasts 4 weeks is but a trifle and if after the first bottle you are not joyfully satisfied with results—money back.

Mythological King

Crowell's Handbook for Readers and Writers says that "Jamshyd" was the fourth king of the Pishdadian dynasty, i. e., the earliest, who is fabled to have reigned for 700 years, and to have had the Deevs, or Genii, as his slaves. He possessed a seven-ringed golden cup, typical of the seven heavens, the seven planets, the seven seas, etc., which was full of the elixir of life; it was hidden by the genii and was said to have been discovered while digging the foundation of Persepolis.—Washington Star.

MEDUSA'S HEAD

SYNOPSIS

In concern over the disappearance of the young and beautiful wife of his wealthy friend, Crandall White, Aaron Glaenzer engages Motherwell, private investigator, to find her. A note from the missing woman warns her husband not to call in the police, saying she "hoped to come back." Mrs. White is younger than her husband, and his devotion has been the talk of New York. Her leaving him is unexplainable. She is known to have with her a remarkable jewel, the "Medusa's Head," but her maid, Coggeshall, thinks she had little else of value. It is found that Mrs. White has all her jewelry with her. Coggeshall talks mysteriously of her mistress being "worried." Through an advertisement Motherwell secures the Medusa's head, which, he is told, an "old woman" had thrown out of a cab. From the finder he gets a clew which sends him to the office of Doctor Wentzel, consulting chemist. Wentzel is away, but from a clerk Motherwell secures a package which he recognizes as coming from the White home. He takes it to Glaenzer, and the two men speculate over the disappearance, without getting any nearer to a solution of the mystery.

"I can't see any picture at all," said Motherwell slowly, "none at all. There's one, the obvious one. And of course it may be the actual one. I don't say that. But I do say that if I let it get in my way, I couldn't do anything. You think Coggeshall knows all about it. Now, I don't. I think she knows something, a little, a lead, a clew. But she's afraid to tell it. Why? I think she had no idea that her mistress had gone. I think she hasn't any idea where she has gone, but believes she can find something out from Wentzel. I believe if she knew, she'd tell me."

Mr. Glaenzer shook his head.

"Well," he said heavily, "my head is too old a head to make a new picture, perhaps. But Clelia would never have parted willingly with this," and he stared, half bitterly, half delightedly, at the frozen smile on the wonderful lips encircled by the tiny tossing serpents. "Whoever took that from her, took the thing she loved the best, Motherwell."

He sighed.

"I'll put this away," he added and opened the box. Lifting out the heavy, opalescent half-globe of onyx, he shook it free from the tissue wrappings.

"I gave her that last Christmas," he said. "See, the frame has slipped."

He gathered up a handful of paper from the bottom of the box and stared questioningly at the young man.

"What's this?" he asked and shook it free.

A dark blue flashed from the paper, and as something slipped from his hand he seized another roll of it and shook it out. A three-strand pearl necklace fell on his lap.

"What?" cried Motherwell, and falling on the rest they unrolled them: cool emerald and bleeding ruby, and lace work of platinum and spray of icy diamonds.

"And I left them in the checkroom at the club!" the young man gasped.

At twenty minutes after six, a slim young man on a side-car motor cycle chugged up to the front entrance of Brucca's, parked his machine around the corner, and hailed a lounging, lanky boy to watch it for him.

"No nonsense, now," he said, "no fussing with her, mind! And give me the horn five times if he, or anybody like him, gets out ahead of me."

"Yes, sir. I'll look after it all right, sir. Thank you, sir."

The young man strolled into the restaurant and peered about among the tables.

Dissatisfied, apparently, he returned to the street, and lounged about near the entrance. At six twenty-five, a stocky little German-American with a sandy mustache hurried in, and the cyclist entered a moment after.

"Anybody for Hunter, yet?" he asked of the head waiter.

"No, sir, would you want a table?"

"If Doctor Schaffner is wanted, I am in the corner," the sandy mustache interrupted. "Schaffner—don't forget."

The cyclist, refusing several tables in the center of the room, ended by sitting next to the sandy mustache, his back turned squarely on him. Slipping out of his heavy coat, he pulled a newspaper from his pocket and began to read.

"If anybody's for Hunter, I'm here," he said loudly. "I'll order when my friend comes."

Doctor Schaffner drummed impatiently on the table, and ordered cigarettes.

After a little he dashed out to the entrance again, returning triumphantly with a tall, dark man.

"You see," he explained as they seated themselves, "I have so little time. Have you any good news for me? Could you get any?"

"It's my belief, doctor, there's not a gram in the country—not a centigram," the dark man replied.

"Oi, oi, oi! To think of that! Awful! Awful!"

"I wired to Pittsburgh, and they referred me to Baltimore, but—nothing doing. You might as well ask for radium—"

"Ach! Radium! I can get all the radium I want!" fumed the little man. "What a country! What a country!"

He played with the menu.

"Bring me some ham and eggs," the cyclist commanded loudly, "I can't wait any longer."

Brucca's begins to dine early. The dark, oak-trimmed room was well filled by now, and the rattle and clatter were under way.

The two lowered their voices and the cyclist shifted his shoulders slightly but gained little by it.

"He's nearly crazy—it's incomprehensible—in-com-pre-hen-si-ble!" the German's voice emerged in bursts. "After all these years—to have come on us so suddenly—no warning—not a hint!"

The other murmured unintelligibly.

"It's not the money—we would give it all back—my G—d, Hennike, she keeps offering—"

Again the murmur.

"It's the reputation! His reputation! What is a settled income, even, to that—for him! And the awkwardness—du Liebe, see what she threatens! And she means it, too. Of course, death, that is all very well. That is easy. But where does it leave us?"

The dark man talked for some time.

"And so I say!" the doctor cried. "So I tell him. These things cannot be done! Simply, not. He is as crazy as she is. I am sorry—it is awful. But—there are limits to human power, Hennike. It will have to be explained. It will have to come some time, I suppose? After all—a person's death is his own affair. But if we are not careful, it will be ours!"

Silence, and hasty eating.

"You couldn't possibly get White—even now?" the dark man asked.

Sandy mustache cackled into irrepressible nervous laughter.

"White?" he mimicked, "get White! That's good! Man, if you could get White, it would be worth a million to us—a million. He'd make his fortune. Do you suppose he hasn't tried?"

More eating.

"I have to telephone at quarter past seven," Schaffner began suddenly, "I'm getting some one out there. We've only an old woman there, you know, and she's worn out. I'll be back."

The cyclist beckoned his waiter and paid quickly.

"Is there a telephone booth here?" he inquired, and made his way to the front of the restaurant.

When Schaffner slipped into the next but one to him, he was talking loudly.

"Well, I waited enough," he was saying. "No, I'm leaving. This minute. No, I can't."

He went to the shelf of telephone books and fumbled the leaves while the other man got his number, then went back, but this time to the next booth.

"What?" he heard. "Yes, Schaffner. Did you get her? Not before noon tomorrow? Well, it will have to do, I suppose. She's free at noon? Then bring her down with you—twelve forty-five from Hoboken—can you catch that? I will meet you; wait there at the station. I want a very special nurse, you know—no nonsense—oh, yes, entirely mental—a marked case of collapse—she's thoroughly trusty? What's that? What?

There was a pause.

"One moment, doctor—this is the doctor? Doctor Wentzel wants to be sure that it is Dr. L. P. Jarvis and not Doctor Joseph—you're not the brother? You will understand, doctor, it is a little embarrassing for me, not having met you— Of course, of course. No, I can't very well discuss it— Doctor Wentzel will give you all the details— Well, I can't say that, but one night more, I suppose, we can manage. . . . Yes, he is pretty bad—no sleep at all— No, but sometimes these things cannot be helped, you understand— Twelve forty-five, then, from Hoboken? You and Miss—what is it? Lingstrom? Very well. We shall expect you. Good-by."

He hurried out of the booth, with a quick glance at his neighbor. The cyclist was talking in a loud, harsh voice. But the moment his neighbor had left the telephone room, he stepped out and found the lanky boy around the corner.

"Follow the short, sandy one. If he goes to the ferry all right, or the Hudson tube, never mind. Anywhere else, watch him."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Genius Died in Poverty

Friedrich Wilhelm Goebel, recognized in Germany as the inventor of the military tank, died without collecting the 10,000,000 marks he demanded as compensation from the ministry of defense for his invention. His widow was left penniless. Goebel, old and poor at his death, first exhibited his tank in 1913, when it climbed a 50 per cent grade amid the applause of high imperial officers. He maintained to the last that failure of the kaiser's officers to recognize the importance of the tank caused Germany's defeat in the war. The tank was one of a long list of Goebel's inventions, ranging over the fields of aviation, shipping, electricity and warfare.

Young People's League

The Epworth league got its name from the name of the town in Lincolnshire, England, which was the birthplace of John Wesley, founder of Methodism. The Epworth league was born in Cleveland, Ohio, in May, 1889 at a meeting of representatives of various young people's societies.

KIND DEEDS THAT LIVE IN MEMORY

Love's Keen Eyes for the Needs of Others.

Few short phrases are more expressive than Wordsworth's "And oh, the difference to me," referring to the passing of Lucy who lived unknown, and few could know when Lucy ceased to be. "Love adds a precious seeing to the eye," and who does not believe that love opens the eye to the needs of others less fortunate than ourselves? We would indeed be fulfilling the law if we allowed ourselves to love as much as we might.

We were taught in childhood not to let the left hand know what the right had was doing. Some of earth's happiest creatures carry that instruction into adult life and it is only by accident that we find out about all their good deeds. There is Jane, who never forgets the bunch of violets at Easter nor the basket of dainty fruit on Christmas morning. It was Bessie who knew every need of the community where she lived, and was there with first aid before anyone else had heard of it; aside from her flowers and glasses of transparent jelly, her cheery presence banished all gloom and depression.

We recall with grateful heart Edith, suddenly disappearing for a short time and returning with needles and thread ready to help with the layette or the accumulated family mending. And that thoughtful one who sought us out on moving day, and took the little ones away to keep them out of mischief, in the meantime concocting some nourishing food for tired bodies. And Alice whose service to the world was in being "an advocate of the absent," never allowing an unpleasant word to be said without rising to a defense.

It is usually the mother of the family who performs numberless unnoticed duties. Her "little, nameless, unremembered acts of kindness and of love," are often taken for granted by the unthinking for whom she performs the greatest service. "What is home without a mother," has a many-sided significance. The little details of mother's life, if faithfully recorded, would fill a large volume. She must be versatile, indeed, who can acceptably fill the place of wife, mother, hostess and friend; chief cook and bottle washer; seamstress, peacemaker, first aid for all ills, and what not, to say nothing of the menial tasks she must of necessity perform. But what is life without infinite succession of little things, annoying or pleasing, which occur daily until the weeks and months and years accumulate, and we find them merged into threescore years and ten. Imperceptibility the years pass, leaving but fragmentary memories.—Indianapolis News.

Tut's Caricature Found

Some ancient-time sculptor conceived the idea that a bust of King Tut-Ankh-Amen at shaving time would create a laugh. It is doing so now, for an amusing caricature of the king, his beard bristling and soapy, has been discovered at his burial place at Tek-el-Amarna, according to a report from Cairo, Egypt. A painting outfit also found, may have been the king's own.

Human Transparency

Senator Robinson of Arkansas said in a Kiwanis address in Little Rock. "Shirkers always give themselves away. They're as easy to see through as Smith.

"Mrs. Smith whispered in the small hours:

"'John, the baby's awake.'

"'Well, I'm not,' Smith whispered back."

Height and Intelligence

Investigation of 1,000 children in Glasgow, Scotland, apparently proved that there is a distinct connection between height and intelligence, which was more noticeable among boys than girls.

The Scheme Seldom Fails

Joe—Do you know how to make a peach cordial?

Jack—Sure, send her some candy.

It might be that genealogy is worth more to prove what one is good for than astrology.

TUESDAY AND THURSDAY NIGHTS
JOE PALOOKA
You've seen him in the comic strips. Now he's on the air! Joe Palooka — the world's worst dumb-bell — the world's best loved character!

Joe Palooka, Boxing Champ, Is Now Heard on the Air

Joe Palooka, that lovable boob of the prize ring and comic strip created by Ham Fisher, now comes to radio.

Palooka, his fights and troubles and mixups, is being presented each Tuesday and Thursday at 6:45 p. m., EST, over the Columbia system.

The dumb, gentle but unbeatable boxing champ is portrayed by Ted Bergman, 200-pound Columbia actor who looks like a prize-fighter, in the fifteen-minute hilarious sketches adapted by Georgia Backus. His bold and wise-cracking manager, Knobby Walsh, is played by Frank Readick, 130-pound Thespian. Ted Husing describes Joe's tremendous fight scenes and Harry von Zell announces the program.

MICROPHONICS

Charles Campbell, trombonist in Nat Shilkret's orchestra, was a member of George Olsen's band when that ensemble played over the first network in the history of broadcasting. It was in the days of carbon microphones and just before a program went on the air a production man would give the mike a few hammer blows in order to insure good reception. The trombonist recalls that none of his fellow musicians took the possibilities of network broadcasting very seriously that day. Now, by a strange irony, he plays in "Music That Satisfies" which is heard over the largest sponsored network in radio history.

Inventor Has Idea of Houses by the Quart

Buttons, collar studs, the backs of hairbrushes, and all kinds of things are already made from milk, and now comes an inventor who proposes to turn the cow into a provider of building materials for houses. He claims that casein, or solidified milk, is an ideal substance for the purpose, since it is easy to work and would make it possible to erect soundproof and draught-proof buildings.

His villas are to be planned on novel lines. Instead of digging down for the foundations, he is going to erect a large mast. The house hangs from a framework erected round this and provided with ball bearings. The idea is that you can turn it just as you like in order to bring any room at will into the sunshine or the shade.

It is to be doubted, though, whether the new idea will catch on, for few people desire dwellings in which they will be permanently "up the pole."—London Tit-Bits.

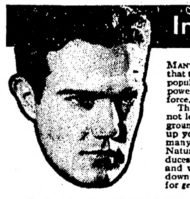
Floating Breakwater

Costly stonework to make a breakwater, behind which boats may seek shelter, is obviated by the use of a string of metal pontoons, which have the effect of quieting a boisterous sea as effectually as a bulkhead of stone or piles. The units consist of metal structural shapes of an openwork character which are supported by air-filled tanks and are chained together in strings of six or eight, each end of the string being secured to a substantial pier. The action of the waves dashing is effectually checked by the open character of the metal work and their force broken so that the water behind the barrier is quite still for the purpose of a safe harbor.

Without a belief in a future state of punishment, too much strain is put on the philosophy of many.

There is less to worry about after the worst has happened than there was before.



In the Movies
MANY people joke about it, but the fact is that the "cave-man" type is now the most popular on the screen. Women love a powerful personality . . . one with vigor, force, and determination.

Be Loyal!

Folks! The time has come that you can not let your stock run at large in the village. If you insist on keeping chickens for one thing, then you must fence them in or be strict about keeping them on your own propery. Too many complaints about this is coming in to us. Those whom live on the outskirts of town are asked to take care of their sheep and cattle. No one cares to have your stock tramping up their yards.

Fix up your fence so that the cows don't break out at night and treat your neighbor like you want him to treat you.

Those whom have left manure and piles of rubbish around the premises they have used this winter are asked to start at once to clean them up.

When Government Aids Agriculture

Demand for relief, agricultural or otherwise, comes naturally from those who feel most keenly the impact of economic pressure. Those most affected fly quickly to government for aid. But too frequently agencies set in operation by governments simply postpone inevitable readjustments. The basic laws of supply and demand have never been permanently and successfully set aside. So in general governmental intervention that artificially stimulates prices or even maintains them when the prevailing economic situation obviously shows that readjustments are inevitable are expedients that yield only temporary relief rather than permanent cure. Porous plasters may relieve pain for the moment but they rarely get at the seat of the real trouble.—H. L. Russell.

When army worms threatened the crops of Marshall County, Tennessee, information concerning the pests was made available by the College of Agriculture, and bankers immediately took steps to organize a war against the common enemy, calling mass meetings in their communities where complete facts and helpful recommendations for eradication could be put before the greatest number of people possible. This timely action saved the destruction of many fields of crops.

High School Play Attracts Crowd

Despite the unfavorable weather conditions the high school auditorium was comfortably filled for both performances of the annual high school play last Friday and Saturday evening.

The play, "A Peach of a Family" was enjoyable throughout and the young actors and actresses did their work very creditably.

The cast was headed by Stilof Anderson, who ably portrayed the character of the ne'er-do-well yet lovable Steven Richmond. Gladys Sanoden won the admiration of the audience by the ease with which she played the part of the sweet and clever Pauline Shelby.

In the comedy roles Julius Faiman, as Uncle August, and Beulah Bennes, as Aunt Bertha, were exceptionally well fitted for their parts and their lively conversation added much to the enjoyment of the play.

Reuben Carlson, as the serious minded Jack Belmont; Eunice Johnson, as the indulgent housekeeper; and Oscar Nohre, as the lawyer, also succeeded in making much of their opportunities, as did Carl Fredrickson in the character of a wealthy business man.

Minor parts were taken by Eunice Lindholm, Ethel Nohre, Ruby Hall and Irene Peterson as the family adopted by Steven Richmond to make him settle down to work.

The play was one of the best ever staged here and the cast, together with their directors, are to be congratulated.

Mrs. Victor Johnson and infant daughter arrived home Saturday from Thief River Falls.

Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Lasseson and family of Fargo, N. D., and Miss Helen Knutson of Thief River Falls spent the week end at the Wm. Paskewitz home.

Memorial Day Excursion

Another cent-a-mile excursion will be put into effect over Memorial Day by the railways in this territory, according to advice received today by C. A. Larson, Great Northern agent here.

It will apply on the Great Northern system east of Havre, Mont., and on the other lines in correspoding territory. The rates go into effect May 27 with final return limit May 31.

These special round trip rates, which amount to three-fifths of the regular one-way fare, are good in day coaches. Another special rate of one fare plus 25 cents has been made in this territory for the round trip for passengers desiring Pullman accommodations.

The cent-a-mile rate was tried out last month for the first time in this territory, and proved so successful that the railways decided to try it again in an attempt to get back the travel business lost to the highways.

A new week-end rate also has been put into effect for the remainder of the year in the territory east of the Mont.—N. D., state line. It provides a round trip for the payment of one fare plus 25 cents where the regular one-way fare is less than $10, and extends from Fridays to midnight Tuesdays.

Benevolent Society Formed

Mr. J. Pettigrew, of Fargo, is organizing the Thief River Falls Benevolent Society, a mutual home protective association in that city. This society is similar to societies organized in other communities of the northwest in the past several years. The plan of the organization is simply a mutual agreement by the members to pay to the beneficiary one dollar upon the death of a member. There is no premium nor assesment except on death of a member. One thousand and one hundred members only are taken into any one unit and no further members can be taken in except upon the death of a member or the dropping out of a member. Upon the demise of a member the secretary sends assesment notice to the members and after 30 days he turns the sum over to the beneficiary. Ten per cent is used to defray the cost of bookkeeping and mailing of notices, the balance is paid over intact.

The organization is well under way in Thief River and members are also being signed up here at Holt. O. C. Paulson is secretary of the Society, S. A. Berg is solicitor and the board of directors is composed of E. T. Nelson, Martin Erickson and Rasmus Oen.

Mr. Pettigrew reports that there is at the present time over 100,000 members of these organizations in the state of North Dakota alone and the highest assesments ever made up to the present time is ten in one year and that the average has been from four to six. Records of similar societies running over a period of twenty years has established this average he said.

Under the rules of the society, failure to respond to an assasment notice within thirty days automatically suspends a member and another may be allowed to join to take his place.

Adults 16 to 65 inclusive are joined into one group while children 1 year to 15, vouched for by parents, are joined into another group. The assesments for the children's group is fifty cents and the benefit is limited to $500.00.

Walter Sandberg is the local representative for the society at Holt and he wishes to announce that the organization takes in members up to a distane of one hundred miles and, he states that this is the cheapest thousand dollar protection that you can carry. See him now for an application at the Cities Service Station in Holt. adv.

Help Us Help Our Community

"In the great war," says President Hoover, "our people gave their undivided energies to the national purpose. Today we are engaged in a war against depression. If our people will give now the same service and the confidence to our government and our institutions, the same unity and solidarity of courageous action which they gave in the great war, we can overcome this situation."

We are doing our "bit"—lending one citizen's money to another—helping develop our community and our help is limited only by the amount of money deposited with us.

Pilot Sings; Order Comes "Pipe Down"

Plane Broadcasts Entertain Short Wave Radio Owners.

Chicago.—Owners of short wave radio sets who have heard amusing things going on in the ether during the early hours of the morning are to have much of their enjoyment curtailed as airline officials have instructed their pilots to confine their broadcasting to routine matters. During the still night lonely air mail pilots, flying high above an almost invisible earth, have no company, but the microphones of their two way radio telephone sets, and they have been wont to drift into song or carry on conversations with other pilots flying miles away.

Heber Miller, who flies between Seattle and Medford, Ore., tried his voice on "Life Is Just a Bowl of Cherries" recently at 2 a. m. one clear night. He got a stack of fan mail the following day that would have been envied by a professional crooner.

Al Gilhousen and Ralph Virden, talking over the "good old days" one early morning while flying miles apart along the west coast, learned later that apparently most of the Pacific coast had been listening to their reminiscences, and so the orders to "pipe down" have gone out. Many interesting stories, however, are told of some of the broadcasts.

One mail pilot, for instance, got vexed with threatening weather one early morning and spoke about it in no uncertain terms. Too late he realized that his microphone had been switched on, and his remarks, intended only for a dark cloud bank, had been carried far and wide. He did the only thing he could think of—broadcast a rather profuse apology, and then he lapsed into a silence that he now breaks only for the short cryptical reports the pilots make every 20 minutes to ground stations along their routes.

"Gosh, wouldn't a good stiff drink of whisky be swell on a morning like this?" was the contribution of another unknown pilot to the lore of early morning reflection. As a rule, these remarks are noted for their scarcity.

An interesting phenomenon that arises to disturb the radio reports of the pilots is "skip distance," a peculiarity of short wave sets. The pilot of a night mail plane flying from New York to Chicago recently found that the ground station at Chicago airport could not hear his calls, while the station at Fort Worth, 1,000 miles away, reported fine reception. His message and the answer were relayed through the Fort Worth station.

Another pilot flying over Redding, Calif., was heard at Des Moines, Iowa, while his dispatcher at Oakland, only 300 miles away, could not hear him at all. Provision is made to counteract these unusual conditions by having the reporting pilots covered not only by their home station but by all other stations, which are situated at intervals of 250 miles along the airways. Thus, when a pilot is not heard by his dispatching station, the message is relayed to that station by a distant station that has heard it distinctly. The answer flies back via the relay.

Died "Pauper"; Her Will Bares $30,000 Bequest

Los Angeles, Calif.—The will of Vila Kaufman, seventy, who died an apparent pauper in Memphis, Tenn., a month ago, was admitted to probate here.

Mrs. Kaufman bequeathed $30,000 to the national committee of federal legislation for birth control, and directed that only $100 be spent for her funeral, at which she asked that there be "no music, no flowers and no clergyman."

Girl's Head Used as Tee by Golf Player

London.—In a freak golf match at a golf club in Surrey, England, a girl's forehead provided the tee for a young professional, George Ashdown, and a less skillful player, C. Mansell.

One of the conditions of the match was that Ashdown should tee up at every hole on the girl's forehead. Miss Ena Shaw, a young London nurse, agreed to be the "tee." At every hole a tee peg was fastened to her forehead by an elastic band. She reclined on the ground and did not appear to be in the least nervous.

The professional, conceding one stroke at each hole to Mansell, made some remarkable shots from the unusual tee and won the match in seven up and five to play.

Asbestos Has New Use

Patient's Own Blood Is Used for Transfusion

Pittsburgh, Pa.—One of the rare instances of successful autotransfusion of blood is attracting attention here. The operation was performed at the Homeopathic hospital by Dr. Frederic S. Morris.

Russell M. Evans, Jr., a fifteen-year-old high school student, was injured in a coasting accident. X-ray examination showed that he had suffered a ruptured spleen, with an internal hemorrhage resulting. The anesthetic relaxed the lad's muscles, allowing the blood to flow into the abdominal cavity. Even the laity scarcely needs to be reminded that this was the most critical stage. With such a large loss of blood in his weakened condition, the boy's life wavered in the balance.

Doctor Morris quickly transferred the blood from the abdominal cavity, filtered it and placed it in a glass container surrounded by hot-water bottles to restore it to body temperature. Then, with the surgeon working at top speed, the youth's own blood was injected into his body through a vein in his left arm. Next the ruptured spleen was removed.

When the boy left the operating table his pulse and blood pressure were declared normal, and at this writing, several days later, his general progress toward recovery is reported "most satisfactory." The operation is considered a distinct contribution to surgery.

King Tut-Ankh-Amen Is Now Accused of Thievery

Tomb Treasures Stolen From His Predecessor.

London. — King Tut-Ankh-Amen's splendid golden treasures, which astonished the world when they were discovered by Lord Carnarvon and Howard Carter in 1922, were mostly second hand, according to J. D. S. Pendlebury of the Egyptian Exploration society.

As a result of his investigations, Pendlebury claims that most of the rich jewels and trappings of state in King Tut's tomb were really the property of King Smenkh-ka-Ra, whose tomb King Tut raided, appropriating the treasures for his own funeral palace.

The theory is based on the recent discovery that the mummy thought to have been that of King Akhenaten III, was really the mummy of somebody else. When this was discovered, the Egyptian government called in Pendlebury to solve the mystery. He found that the mummy in question was really that of Akhenaten's son-in-law, Smenkh-ka-Ra.

"What I discovered," declared Pendlebury, "was that after the heretic Akhenaten died the population of Amara rose up and cursed his memory and cursed as well the worship of the sun's disk, which he had founded. They smashed everything possible in the tomb, defaced all the monuments by hacking out the king's name.

"Amara was then deserted after a life of only 20 years, and the people returned to the old gods. Thebes became once more the Egyptian capital.

"Smenkh-ka-Ra, who married the eldest daughter of Akhenaten, may have ruled with him, or he may have succeeded; we are not quite sure. However, he died at Thebes and was buried with magnificent splendor.

"When Tut-Ankh-Amen, his brother-in-law, succeeded to the throne he desecrated the tomb and acquired all the treasure buried with the last king. All the magnificent funeral furniture was 'done up' and placed in his own tomb in the valley of the kings.

"The body was not destroyed, however, and it is Smenkh-ka-Ra who is now in Cairo museum labeled at Akhenaten."

Pussy Proves Help to Electrician in Wiring

Kingston, N. C.—Paul Long, an electrician, recommends that every electrican carry a cat.

Long had to run a cable through a small space between the roof and ceiling of a house for a distance of 80 feet. He tied a string to the cat's tail, shoved it in one end, and closed the opening. He opened the other end, and in a few minutes the cat came out with the string. He pulled the cable through.

CROSS-MATCHED

By MARTHA M. WILLIAMS

(WNU Service)

GWEN flung up her arms, yawning, whereupon Elise asked: "How's the book? Any good?"

Gwen yawned again. "Deadly stupid, writer-man hasn't got a thing to say—and keeps on saying it in all the moods and tenses."

"You shock me deeply!" Elise flung back rising. "A gift book, too. Whatever shall we say to the author-sender?"

"Write him straight off—say we can't wait to thank him till after reading," Gwen counseled.

"But you don't intend to tell him what you think?" from Elise.

Gwen sighed saying: "Truth's not merely brutal but unpopular. Why hurl large chunks of it at a poor soul who never did you the least bit of harm?"

"You forget—" from Elise. "He insisted on sitting out all four dances he had written himself down for at the Valentine party—when the music was making my feet dance in spite of me."

The two were real friends, in spite of being kinswomen, and doomed to live in the same wide plantation, miles from everywhere, but in auto-reach of almost anywhere a well-conditioned fancy might choose to stray. Elise was statuesque, Gwen roguishly pretty. They were neither exactly rich nor poor. Elise herself was bidding her time, being the sort that wears well, and reaches full blow around thirty. Long before that time Gwen would marry somebody—somebody other than Newell Blair whom she had teased and flouted since the era of short frocks, in spite of his money, and his pedigree. Both were exactly what Elise had set her mind on—therefore she waited.

Charles Joseph Seaforth had seemed manna from heaven—he was good looking, had an air of distinction. Elise had done her best to make him see in Gwen an enchantress, but had had her trouble for nothing. His book had come to her, the first copy off the press he wrote, with a florid inscription that was yet prudently vague. Craftily she had given Gwen the first reading, hoping by doing so to quicken her interest in the book's writer.

Gwen had turned the tables by insisting that Elise was in courtesy bound to acknowledge the gift at once. Frowning Elise set herself at the task, but stopped short after the dateline to stare at a resplendent car purring to a halt at the front steps. Seaforth and Newell Blair sprang from it and rushed inside almost without knocking. Elise held out both hands to them as she rose, crying: "Luck indeed! Saves me a hard job—trying to tell you all we think of THE BOOK in writing, I've only part of an opinion now. Gwen hasn't let me read more than snatches—says she can't eat nor sleep until she knows how it all turns out."

"Mighty kind of her," from Seaforth.

Blair scowled—hard. "Maybe I can break the spell," he growled, making for the back piazza. Gwen's special happy haunt. In a minute he was back, book in hand, Gwen tucked possessively under his arm. "I am taking her for a drive in the new car, so she shan't pester you two any more," he said, tossing the book to Elise.

"Mighty glad to see you—but really this is 'so sudden,'" she smiled at Seaforth.

"I simply had to come—to know what you thought—nothing else matters—nothing in all the world," he said huskily. "Somehow the book is selling amazingly—or I shouldn't have dared—it is all I have, you know—except hope—and I-love."

Elise felt herself profoundly shaken, but completely dazed.

"How can you like me? A plain country girl, when you have seen so much of cities?"

"Because you are my dream. What I hoped for and never thought to find," he said stepping back a pace, the better to look into her eyes. "You know—I shouldn't be here, but for Blair—the noblest fellow alive. You see, I wrote him asking whether he was my rival—that was my black dread—he had so much, I, almost nothing. He answered me, man to man: 'To me there is just one possible wife in all the world. Her name is Gwendoline Trevor—unless she comes to me of her own good will, I shall be a lone man all my life.' And then actually he came for me—brought me to his home two days back—rested me there, and heartened me for—the crisis of my fate. Funny—he says you are the finest woman living—much too fine for the general run of men—but he could not love you, even if he had never seen Gwen."

Elise choked—silently she held out her hand to him. He laid his cheek upon it, reverently as one might touch an altar. A little silence fell between them, then as the purring motor sounded distantly, Elise put her other hand upon the adoring lover's head, saying: "I will do my best to give you back your love."

The double wedding six months later was, of course, a social event. Looking on acidly the Widow Martin said: "Cross-matched teams if ever I saw 'em," whereupon Squire Burgess chuckled: "Glad you think so Susan. Cross matches were the best teams ever I drove—and I've been at the business full fifty years."

SABBATH DAY OF REST AND WORSHIP

At the time Moses was given the Ten Commandments the Sabbath day was the seventh day of the week, one of the feast days. After he had received the Commandments, the Sabbath day was observed as a day of rest and worship. It was to this ancient Jewish Sabbath that the Fourth Commandment referred.

The association of Sunday with the true Sabbath and its development as a day of rest came about with the dawn of Christianity. From the beginning many Christians commemorated the first day of the week as Resurrection day, or Lord's day. There does not seem to be any evidence that the first day was originally intended as a substitute for the Jewish Sabbath. In fact, most of the early Christians observed both the Sabbath and the Lord's day.

The tendency to observe the first day of the week was confirmed by the Roman emperor Constantine in 321 A. D., when he issued the civil decree that "all the judges and townspeople, and the occupation of all traders," should "rest on the venerable day of the sun." As time passed and the Christian church grew in strength, the majority of them paid less attention to the Sabbath day and more to the Lord's day, until it finally supplanted the Sabbath. Many took the position that the first day of the week had divine sanction and that the Fourth Commandment was applicable to it instead of to the Scriptural Sabbath of the Hebrews.

Practical Eugenics

The idea of a settlement of men and women of perfect physical and mental specimens occurred to Albert Dachert and, after preaching his doctrine for a while, he succeeded in arousing an interest in his proposition to the extent that the city of Strasbourg placed a site at his disposal. Up to this time 150 modern houses have been constructed and occupied by couples brought together by this means. Each couple was accepted only after they had undergone an examination and had come up to the physical requirements and had expressed their desire to raise a family about them. The result is that the birth rate is much higher than in Strasbourg and the behavior of the citizens is said to be exemplary.

How One Man Lost 22 Pounds

Mr. Herman Runkis of Detroit writes: "A few lines of thanks from a rheumatism sufferer—my first bottle of Kruschen Salts took all the aches and swellings out of my joints—with my first bottle I went on a diet and lost 22 pounds and now I feel like a new man."

—10—

"All right, sir."

Ten-thirty found the cyclist in the Glaenzer library. The jeweler looked tired.

"Yes," he said, "I went down. I had to see him, you know. He's five years older. If she doesn't come back, I don't think he'll bother to live very long, Motherwell. No, not very long!"

The young man made a sympathetic little noise in his throat.

"I asked if he wanted to see you, and he said no. As a matter of fact, he has nothing to tell us. He says she was particularly bright and cheery—a little nervous, perhaps, and changeable, but very bright."

"Coggeshall admits she's been worried for a month."

"So you said. I told him that. He's not very fond of Coggeshall, but is quite sure she's devoted to Mrs. White. You think you'll go out there, Motherwell?"

"Oh, yes, decidedly."

"But the man—this Wentzel—after all we know what he is—what he handles—"

"Oh, I hardly think he'll blow me up? Explosives would be wasted on me, you know.

"We've got to see where he fits in. I don't believe he has her there, but if he has, why then, we needn't look any further. If he hasn't, why did she and Coggeshall both go there? And who was the woman she gave the Medusa to? Perhaps the old woman Schaffner said they had out there—I cannot get it into my head, Mr. Glaenzer, just why she threw that away!"

"Surely, because the other things could be disposed of, and that—"

"But they didn't have the other things!"

"You mean they didn't know—"

"I don't believe, Mr. Glaenzer, that anybody in that office had the remotest idea what was in that box!"

"Not the clerk, perhaps, but surely—"

"Not anybody," Motherwell persisted. "Why, sir, imagine leaving that there! What piffling idiocy! It's incredible. They have safes, drawers—something! Anybody has."

"But she must have told them, by now."

"Maybe she couldn't," the young man answered thoughtfully.

"She could write—"

"Maybe not."

"I—I don't like to think that," said the jeweler uneasily.

"If only she could know, Motherwell—sometimes I think she doesn't know, absolutely, how her husband adores her! There's nothing in this world—or the next—he wouldn't forgive, understand, excuse, explain. I believe he would take her back in any circumstances in the world—any, any, any!

"Oh, if only she had been capable of one-tenth of that poor man's affection, Motherwell, nothing would have persuaded her to go like that, without a word, a sign, an appeal for help, even!"

"You think she didn't love him, then?"

"No, no," Glaenzer answered quickly, "I wouldn't say that, Motherwell. She has always been affectionate—affectionate and devoted. You couldn't ask for any more. Heaven knows, he was satisfied. But to compare her feeling to his—of course, no one would expect it. The situation was too plain. Think of their ages. Of what he had to offer her! No, no—he bought her, Motherwell, for her youth and beauty and charm. She was the loveliest thing he had ever seen. And she's always been true to her bargain, in my opinion. She did well, and she knew it; she's a very practical young woman— You are going out there alone?"

"I think," the young man replied, "that I shall take Coggeshall."

The jeweler stared.

"You—you mean you think Coggeshall knows she's out there?"

"I mean if she knows she isn't, she won't go," said Motherwell. "And then I won't go, either."

Coggeshall was waiting for "the young man who had come to see the effect of electric light on the dressing table mirror." It was understood that the cross lights on this important bit of glass had irritated madam of late.

Standing in front of her in the sea-green and ivory room, he threw her an easy glance.

"If you could see Mrs. White tomorrow—would you like to?" he asked her.

"Oh, Mr. Wells. Could I—can you? Did she—?"

"It's only a guess—a jump in the dark," he said. "There may be a little risk in it, but honestly I can't see much, and I think you're a pretty good sport, Coggeshall. We're going out to Doctor Wentzel's."

She started nervously and caught his eye for a moment, then averted her own.

"Oh," she said.

"Yes," he announced, "I went there just after you did. All the jewels were there—"

"No, sir!"

"In the same box with the paperweight. I judged she had left them there. So now we're going out to his place in the country, on the chance. Can you be ready at nine o'clock?"

"Certainly, sir. Have you always—did you know about Doctor Wentzel, all along, sir?"

"No," said Motherwell, "I didn't. But I found out, the day you were there. Was it you who threw away the Medusa's head?"

"Me, sir? Threw it away? Do you mean it's been found, then? It was Mrs. White's favorite, sir, and it's not likely it would be thrown away. If anyone took it from her, you may depend they had to fight for it!"

"Well," he said, "we'll see. It would be a great help, Coggeshall, if you could tell me to just what extent Doctor Wentzel—"

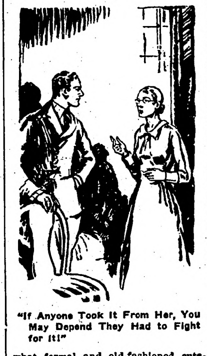
She turned an obstinate profile.

"If you know about it, Mr. Wells, I don't need to tell you," she said in a low voice.

"All right," he said good-naturedly, "we'll let it go at that. Be ready at nine, with a suitcase, will you?"

CHAPTER VI

Two quiet-looking men, capped and goggled for motoring, were in the car next morning, one acting as chauffeur, the other in the tonneau. Mr. Wells would have been called "Doctor Wells" by any student of physiognomy, without the least doubt: his shell glasses, turned into a pince-nez, his somewhat formal and old-fashioned cutaway coat, his little black bag, the stiff mustache that transformed his mouth, would have made an assisting nurse out of a woman who looked the part much less than Coggeshall.



"If Anyone Took It From Her, You May Depend They Had to Fight for It!"

They drove in silence through the city, out of it, into the suburban district of New Jersey. Each was plunged in his thoughts. The two men, as the trees and fields appeared, spoke briefly of their color and freshness, but the woman sat pale and silent, nerving herself, obviously, for some coming shock or strain.

At length they turned into a gateway and curved along a winding drive.

"You've got that whistle, Coggeshall?" Mr. Wells asked suddenly.

"Yes, sir."

"In case anything prevents me from using my own, blow it as hard and as often as you can. I really don't think it will be at all necessary, you know, but come right along, both of you, in case. These people aren't out for murder. They're badly scared, as it is. If Wentzel knows where she is, this will settle it, I think. Do you know him, Coggeshall?"

"I've seen him once, sir."

"But not Schaffner?"

"No, sir, never."

"All right. Remember your name. And mine. You might just say 'doctor'—it's easier."

"Yes, sir. I'll remember."

"You're not frightened, Coggeshall?"

"Yes, sir, but it doesn't matter."

The man in the tonneau gave a short laugh.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Defense of Hobbies

It was "Tristram Shandy" that made Lawrence Sterne famous, but he had other hobbies than writing novels, many of them, books, shooting, painting and fiddling. His excuse for indulging in so many hobbies was framed in words like these: "Have not the wisest men in all ages, not excepting Solomon himself, had their hobby-horses, their running horses, their coins and their cockle shells, their drums and their trumpets, their fiddles and their butterflies? And so long as a man rides his hobby-horse peaceably and quietly along the king's highway, and neither compels you nor me to get up behind him, pray sir, what have you or I to do with it?"

Harmless Shark

The basking sharks sometimes attain a length of 30 feet or more, but they have very small teeth and their diet consists necessarily of small fishes that travel in shoals and other small soft sea creatures which they take into their huge mouths while lying lazily on the surface of the ocean. This species of shark is hunted for its oil, a large one yielding as much as a ton and a half.

Who Was Who?

By Louise M. Comstock

BROTHER JONATHAN

BACK in Revolutionary days it was Brother Jonathan, not Uncle Sam who stood for all the faults and virtues of this country. Even George Washington, when confronted by a knotty problem of state, was wont to say "We will have to see what Brother Jonathan has to say about it."

Brother Jonathan was Jonathan Trumbull, governor of Connecticut at the time of the Revolution, one of our first great patriots. He was also ancestor of an illustrious line of Trumbulls, including John, artist, who in 1786 painted the huge historical pictures in the rotunda of the Capitol, and the modern governor of Connecticut, John H. Trumbull, whose daughter not so long ago married John Coolidge.

Of all colonial governors in office at the outbreak of the Revolution, Jonathan Trumbull alone was loyal to the colonies. Throughout the duration of the war his store at Lebanon, Conn., was a sort of "war office" where supplies were collected and shipped off to the armies, usually under his own supervision; and in his simple home he sheltered Washington and Franklin, Jefferson, Adams, LaFayette. It was he who financed Ethan Allen's successful expedition against Fort Ticonderoga. When courage lagged he made speeches which stirred up patriotism and won volunteer soldiers, and his state furnished more troops than any other except Massachusetts. Jonathan Trumbull died in 1785, at the age of seventy-five.

TOM THUMB

TOM THUMB, so famous a midget that his name has become synonymous, almost, for any of those tiny people at whom the world always wonders, and sometimes laughs, was a real enough person, but even his real life smacked somehow of the theater.

The famous midget was only fourteen years old when, under the expert management of that famous showman, P. T. Barnum, he ceased to be mere Charles Heywood Stratton of Bridgeport, Conn., and became Gen. Tom Thumb, symbol of all the midgets who ever graced a circus sideshow and compared heights with the tall man. In 1854 Barnum took his find to England where the handsome dwarf was presented to Queen Victoria, and to Paris. The trip was a huge financial success. After their return to this country Barnum decided a little romance would be good publicity for Tom and imported into his company Lavinia Warren, plump and pretty, who boasted 32 inches to Tom's 36 and weighed 29 pounds. Shortly thereafter, attended by the bride's sister, Minnie Warren and Commodore Nutt whom she later married, Lavinia and Tom were united in holy matrimony in an elaborate church ceremony attended by the best society and the most colorful show people and liberally written up in the papers.

Starting at a salary in keeping with his size, three dollars a week, Tom made a mint of money in the show business, eventually lost most of it at poker and died, of apoplexy, in 1883, after, it is said, 20 years of happy married life. Lavinia Thumb later married an Italian dwarf named Count Primo Magri and continued in the show business.

BLUEBEARD

COMPARED to his prototypes in real life the Bluebeard of our fairy story books was a mild and benevolent man. King Henry VIII ran him a close second in the matter of winning and disposing of wives, forbidden doors and box lids abound in literature, from the myth of Pandora down, and it is quite probable that the arch-villain Bluebeard is merely a compilation of many bad men of legend and folk tale all rolled into one.

If credit for inspiring this famous character, however, is to be given any one man, he was Gilles de Raiz, one of Joan of Arc's generals and a marshal of France during the Fifteenth century, whose villainies make Bluebeard appear a meek and home-loving husband. Gilles inherited a large fortune and political prominence; the first he squandered, the second he disgraced. When bankrupt he turned to alchemy, sought the favor, so they say, of the devil through black magic, made human sacrifice of innumerable little boys and girls, and is said to have been the one to betray Joan of Arc into the hands of the English. The church finally convicted him of sorcery, and he was burned at the stake for his atrocious cruelties in 1440. The story-book version of Bluebeard first appeared in the famous French collection of Perrault in 1697.

We Learn by Example

Thus Sully points out, for example: "A child will profit more by daily companionship with an acute observer, be he teacher or playfellow, than by all systematic attempts to train the senses." "The deepest spring of action in us is the sight of action in another," James says. "The spectacle of effort is what awakens and sustains our own effort."—Henry C. King in "Rational Loving."

No Snap for Members of U. S. Marine Band

Anyone who thinks a member of the United States Marine Band has a soft snap of it should take a trip to the Marine barracks and get a glimpse of the musicians at work. There's no chance for temperament in the daily routine of the Marine Band which is heard in the National 4-H club program of the National Farm and Home Hour on the first Saturday in each month.

Rehearsals are serious occasions when every man is tuned up to concert pitch, for every member of the band understands the high expectations of the American public when the United States Marine Band appears in radio broadcasts.

Captain Taylor Branson, renowned leader of the band, wields the baton for the organization, and his able direction and intimate understanding of arrangements play a big part in the splendid performances.

Besides the vigorous rehearsals, there are numerous engagements to be filled by the Marine Band which is in constant demand for diplomatic functions, civic and patriotic parades, White House concerts and the various governmental and social affairs that play a part in the daily life of the Nation's Capital.

MICROPHONICS

Principals in the new WABC-Columbia comic sketch of the prize ring, "Joe Palooka," could come to blows in what might be termed the battle of the century. Four of them have worked out inside the ropes. There's Ted Bergman, 200-pound Palooka of the act, who once in his varied life managed a New York gymnasium. . . . And heavyweight Ham Fisher, cartoonist-creator of the comic strip on which the act is based, who sparred in school, hobnobs with all the fighters and still works out with them. . . . Ted Husing, ring-side commentator at Palooka bouts, who took it on the chin while in the army. . . . Harry von Zell, program announcer, once an amateur lightweight boxer of the Pacific coast. That accounts for all but 130-pound Frank Readick, who plays the part of Knobby Walsh, Palooka's classy manager. He'll toss in the sponge.

"I see that whiskers are again in vogue in England," remarked Ray Knight, the radio comedian. "Personally, I prefer my mutton chops on the inside of my face."

Wilfred Glenn is always called Bill. He says his father named him Bill because he came on the first of the month. He was born in California, which makes him one of the sun-kissed singers.

Anne S. Sutherland, the NBC dramatic actress who plays Ma Betts in "Moonshine and Honeysuckle," as a sideline operates a tea room in New York's Greenwich Village. For years Miss Sutherland played in Broadway productions under the management of Charles Frohman and David Belasco.

Jessica Dragonette, NBC's songbird, returned from a short holiday in Bermuda with a new definition of a zebra. She says she overheard a native describe the black and white striped animals as "sports' model mules."

Each member of the cast of "The Goldbergs" is Jewish. Mrs. Gertrude Berg, the originator and author of the sketches, plays Mrs. Goldberg. James R. Waters, the father, is an alumnus of "Abie's Irish Rose." Rosie Silber and Alfred Kohn play the children.

Log Finally Vanishes

A spruce log, 28 feet long and 14 feet in diameter, which was the butt-cut of a tree that took 11 flat cars to carry, finally went down to the bay with a tide after being in the Columbia Box and Lumber company's mill pond at South Bend, Wash., for 20 years. The log could not be hauled into the head rig without tearing out part of the mill building. It finally was pushed into the current—a much scarred derelict.

Razing of Babylon Not Completed by Darius

Babylon was never entirely destroyed after the time of the conquest by Darius, described in the Book of Daniel. That conquest took place in the year 521 B. C., but except that part of the walls was razed during a rebellion in 514, Darius did not destroy systematically. His son, Xerxes, destroyed part of the great temple of Bel, or Baal, called E-Sagilla, which was also a fortress. The religion of Darius, however, was monotheistic zoroastrianism and because of this many temples fell into disrepair. About 312 B. C. a dynasty arose called the Seleucids, founded by a general of Alexander the Great. He conquered Babylon in 323. When the Seleucids founded the new capital Seleucis near Babylon they used the ancient city as a quarry and there is record that in 275 B. C. all the inhabitants of Babylon were transported to the new town, though it is known that religious services were still held in the old temple of Bel a century later.—Montreal Family Herald.

Fruits With Meat

WHEN you select your lighter clothes for spring—don't forget to select your lighter diet. An unseasonable dinner is as unbecoming as an unseasonable frock—and just as uncomfortable. The vogue for fruits with meat offers some very new and pleasing ensembles.

Have you ever eaten roast shoulder of lamb with browned pears? If so, you haven't forgotten how delicious it was. The roast is prepared as usual, and when it is nearly finished canned pears, which have been well drained and lightly sprinkled with flour, are placed around the meat. When browned, dust with paprika and serve on the platter to garnish the meat.

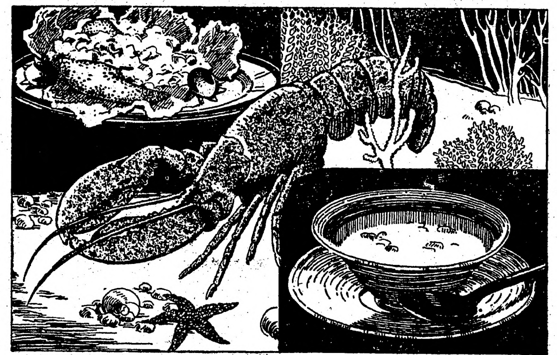
New Suggestions

A pot roast of veal and plums is another likeable combination. When the pot roast is nearly done, add a cupful of canned green gage plums with one cupful of their syrup, and continue cooking slowly for a short time. Serve the plums about the meat; strain and thicken the gravy and serve it separately.

A delicious breakfast suggestion is broiled bacon and apple rings. If you have eggs in little individual pans baking in the top of the oven while the bacon and apple rings are broiling below—breakfast is quickly served.

And for the quickly-prepared dinner, after an afternoon at your bridge club, try Lamb Chops Park Avenue—just place six chops on a well-oiled broiler and cook for eight minutes without turning. Turn each chop and cover with a slice of Hawaiian pineapple. Broil eight minutes more and serve on a hot platter.*

THE LORDLY LOBSTER



LOBSTER, the most highly-rated crustacean, leads a lordly life. In live state he moves gallantly along the bottom of the sea, clad in armor of bluish or blackish green richly blotched with red—the terror of all small sea creatures. In edible form he is transported to the table brilliantly red from steaming or boiling, his shell glistening from a light-oil massage, his meat white, tender and succulent—the event of the meal!

Lobster Biography

The life-story of the lobster is also spectacular. As if destined for a lordly future, the tiny lobster eggs, about one-sixteenth of an inch in diameter, are transported by the female lobster for ten or eleven months before hatching. After its long-delayed hatching, the young larval lobster casts its shell three times before it outgrows adolescence. At the age of three to six weeks it stays near the surface of the water and is destroyed literally by the million by sea storms and enemy fish. Only two out of every ten thousand of this picked lobster race ever reach maturity! For the satisfaction of lobster fanciers, it must be added however, that to counteract this amazingly small survival percentage, a ten-inch lobster averages about ten thousand eggs at a time, and doubles this average with every additional two inches of length.

Canned Lobster Delicious

The large demand for lobsters has come about with their successful canning. Not everyone can travel to Maine or Delaware or Nova Scotia for a lobster dinner, but, due to modern methods, no matter how far inland one lives one can open a can and have lobster in some of its most succulent forms. For canners select the small heavy lobster, known to contain the richest and most tender meat, and pack large pieces of the meat in its own rich oil, so that it is almost impossible, even for the connoisseur, to distinguish canned from fresh-caught lobster. Having none of the difficulties of boiling, cracking shells, or cutting up, canned lobster is the ideal meat for lobster chowder, stew, salad, Newburg, fried lobster or in other tempting forms. There is also a lobster paste that comes in cans which is delicious for sandwiches, hors d'oeuvres or canapés.

Here are two lobster recipes which have made a reputation in Maine shore dinner inns:

Fried Lobster: Dip whole pieces of canned lobster meat in a mixture of egg and cracker crumbs and fry in deep fat. Garnish with slices of lemon and serve with Julienne or other crisply fried potatoes.

Lobster Chowder: Remove tendons from contents of a 6-ounce can of lobster, and shred. Add one cup potato, diced in small pieces, one and one-half cups boiling water and one-half teaspoon salt, and boil until the potatoes are tender. Scald one quart milk with one sliced onion and two tablespoons butter, and season to taste with salt and pepper. Break up six Boston crackers and lay them on top of the lobster and potatoes in a soup tureen, strain the onions out of the milk, and pour over. Serves four to five. A half cup of cream added at the last is a nice addition.*

THE INDIVIDUAL AND HIS BANK

By ROME C. STEPHENSON
President American Bankers Association

R. C. STEPHENSON

BANKERS recognize that their business carries especially heavy public responsibilities and welcome all sound measures to aid them meet the duties this imposes. Unceasing efforts to bring about continually improving methods to safeguard depositors in banks of all kinds have long been uppermost in the plans of bankers' organizations throughout the nation. They are not the outgrowth merely of the past year of business adversity, but have been carried on actively for many years and have resulted in great progress along lines of better, safer banking methods. Although banking along with all business has suffered reverses, conditions in this field have been far less severe than they would have been had not bankers been widely successful in their endeavors to develop the high standards of banking that now generally prevail.

The American Bankers Association and bankers' organizations in every state actively support the principle of government supervision of banking. The national banks, which receive their charters to do business from the federal government, are under the supervision of the Comptroller of the Currency at Washington. Through his efficient staffs of expert bank examiners in every section he has the duty and powers to keep watch of the way every national bank is being conducted, to suggest desirable changes in its policies or methods and even to step in and take control for the protection of the depositors if such action is warranted. The state banks, also, which are chartered by the various state governments, are subject to similar supervision and control by state bank officials. In addition banks in many places have long maintained voluntary clearing house associations which enforce even closer supervision over their members.

Buy Your Wire At Home

"The British steamer, Dewstone, arrived in the Chicago harbor recently from Antwerp, Belgium, with a cargo of 2,050 coils of galvanized wire netting, and 10,500 reels of galvanized barbed wire for Sears, Roebuck & Co., Chicago. Receipt of this cargo follows the recent arrival of a Swedish steamer with 700 tons of wire products for the Montgomery Ward & Co., Chicago, also shipped from Belgium."

An analysis of the effect of this importation on American workmen was made, calling the attention of the farmers to the fact that for every thousand tons of steel manufactured in this country, 400 men have a months's work, and therefore they are deprived of this by these importations, and steel workers are unable to buy the products of the Northwestern farms, even at the present low level of prices, while two years ago when they had work, they could and did pay the high prices the farmers were getting.

Now, Mr. Farmer, you can see that as long as you buy wire from the mail order houses you are starving the workmen in this country upon whom you are depending to buy your products so that you can live. Buy American wire from your merchant.

Vilas County

COUNTIES, like cities, states and nations, get a great kick out of possessing something unusual to set them apart from other similar communities. Nature, in her benevolence, graciously bestowed landscape or other outstanding differences to various counties scattered among our states. In many instances where nature failed to especially endow a county, man has ambitiously come forward and produced some offsetting contribution.

When it comes to lakes, Vilas county, in northern Wisconsin, steps up and proclaims itself "it," modestly hinting that their excellencies, Mr. and Mrs. Public and all the little Publics, take off their hats to her rare and unmatchable collection.

Vilas proudly acclaims that some 1,200 lakes are confined within her wide-flung borders—the smallest, no one knows, the largest perhaps being Trout lake, which is about five miles long by three and one-half miles wide. They run the full gamut of lakedom, in shape and description. Being entirely of glacial origin, they are for the most part limpid sheets of liquid blue or green, basking peacefully in the sun, reflecting quite clearly their timber-lined banks and, needless to say, perhaps, provide refuge for numberless numbers of the finny tribe.

A somewhat unusual feature of these particular lakes is that they are in the main connected by streams navigable for canoes, it being said that one can slip a canoe into the Manitowish river at Boulder Junction, for instance, and by making portages around dams, paddle his way down to the Mississippi river and float out into the Gulf of Mexico.

Gets Telephone Job

Mrs. Tony Rhen was the successful bidder for the operator job at the local telephone office when the bids were opened by the board of directors on Wednesday of last week. Only six bids were received. Four of them offered to take the job at $25.00 a month and one asked $30 and the other $22.50 a month. Mrs. Rhen had her bid in at $25. The operator has to furnish her own fuel and part of the light.

The Little Citizen's League met on Monday morning. The members decided to use the money in our treasury to help buy ice-cream for our picnic on the last day of school.

A large crowd attended the Declamatory Contest at Holt on Thursday evening. In Class A, Yvonne Oakey was awarded 1st place. Her selection was "Epaminondas and His Auntie." Evelyn Larson was awarded second place in Class B. Her selection was 'The Discovery of America'.

Five schools were represented at our Play Day. Schools earning the greatest number of points were: First, Sunnyside; Second, Wilson; and Third, Pioneer. A large crowd attended. We enjoyed a picnic dinner at noon.

The first final tests will be given on Friday. May 20th is our last day of school. We are planning a program and a picnic for the last day.

We raked our yard one day last week. After we had finished we enjoyed a marshmallow roast. Everyone had a fine time. Another day we made flower beds. We have transplanted irises and Japanese Lanterns.

The stolen baby son of Colonel and Mrs. Charles A. Lindbergh was found dead last Thursday in the stubbly Sourland hills of New Jersey only five miles from his home.

The child had been murdered.

The baby, which police bilieve was killed the same night that he was kidnapped, had been struck once on the top of the head on the left side and once on the right below the ear, either blow so violently delivered that it would have caused instant death.

According to the big dailies this week, some of those whom were helping to locate the child and kidnapers, have been only telling false stories.

4-H Club News

The Holt 4-H club met in the Sunnyside schoolhouse on Friday evening. A good program was given, the main features being an accordion selection by Einar Loven and a talk by O. K. Ose.

A very large crowd attended. The next meeting will be held June 10.

The Village Council met Wednesday afternoon and discussed plans for building a new band stand. It is hoped that we can get some quick action on this as, the band boys like to get out in the fresh air to play during the nice spring evenings.

Death Valley

DEATH valley is one of the most remarkable of the many physical features of California. This bed of what once was an inland sea and includes the dry bed of the Amargosa river, which probably is the largest dry river on earth, according to scientists, for some undetermined reason just naturally dried up.

This peculiar name was fastened to it by a party of pioneers during the gold rush of '49 who drove their covered wagons out into its desolate, sunbaked sands, died from thirst, starvation or exposure and never reached the other side.

A land of extremes—a mud-flat with above-freezing temperatures in winter, it registers some of the hottest temperatures in summer. The lowest point in this country—over 300 feet below sea level—it has been called "The Basement of America."

Some fifty miles long, five to ten or more miles wide, sandwiched in between the Panamint mountains on the west and the Amargosa, Black and Kingston ranges on the north and east, Death valley is located in Inyo county, California, near the Nevada boundary line.

Long ago undreamed-of treasures of borax and salt were found to exist in and enormous quantities have been wrest from this land of thirst, famine, romance and adventure, which has lost its death-like grip through the progress of civilization. Both the railroad and the highway engineer have blazed a way to it. And today, although nature's wondrous panorama continues to be astonishingly colorful, the barrenness is broken by a bungalette community which boasts unexpected comforts.

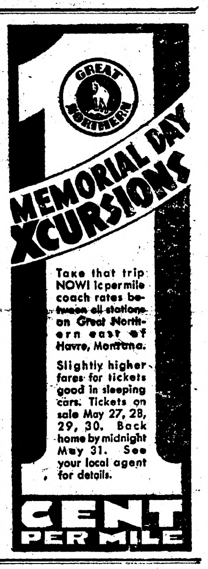
Golf Fiends Cut Loose

The golf players of Holt have organized a local club with about fifteen members. The local club has rented a tract of land from Loyd and Fritz Knutson three miles southwest of town and, have the past week been busy getting the links in shape.

They have an ideal place for a nine hole golf course and they have employed Fritz Knutson as caretaker. The road out to the golf links is along the old trail on the high sandridge running southwest from town, beginning at the schoolhouse.

The road will be marked with painted and lettered arrows all the way out. We congratulate the local sportsmen upon their achievement.

Mrs. M. Nygaard and daughters have this week moved from the Tobiason house to the house next to the Lorentson service station on main street.



Take that trip NOW! 1c per mile coach rates between all stations on Great Northern east of Havre, Montana.
Slightly higher fares for tickets good in sleeping cars. Tickets on sale May 27, 28, 29, 30. Back home by midnight May 31. See your local agent for details.

Help Us Help Our Community

"In the great war," says President Hoover, "our people gave their undivided energies to the national purpose. Today we are engaged in a war against depression. If our people will give now the same service and the confidence to our government and our institutions, the same unity and solidarity of courageous action which they gave in the great war, we can overcome this situation."

We are doing our "bit"—lending one citizen's money to another—helping develop our community and our help is limited only by the amount of money deposited with us.

BABY FRETFUL, RESTLESS?

Look to this cause

When your baby fusses, tosses and seems unable to sleep restfully, look for one common cause, doctors say. Constipation. To get rid quickly of the accumulated wastes which cause restlessness and discomfort, give a cleansing dose of Castoria. Castoria, you know, is made specially for children's delicate needs. It is a pure vegetable preparation; contains no harsh drugs, no narcotics. It is so mild and gentle you can give it to a young infant to relieve colic. Yet it is as effective for older children. Castoria's regulative help will bring relaxed comfort and restful sleep to your baby. Keep a bottle on hand. Genuine Castoria always has the name:

Biggest Concrete Bridge

The Plougastel bridge in Scotland is said to be the largest concrete structure of its kind in the world. In the foundations, the piers and the arch springings where the concrete is in contact with sea water aluminous cement is used, but for the immense arches which are out of reach of sea water attack portland cement is used. As sulphates are frequently met with in the ground aluminous cement permits the use of concrete for foundations with safety.

Speaking of Trees

The pioneer Arbor day state is Nebraska, where the observance began in 1872. Georgia was the first state to initiate forestry in vocational schools. More than 79,000,000 trees were planted in this country last year for reforestation. More oaks are planted along American streets and roadsides than any other variety.

P. S. China's great floods are due in part to the lack of forests.

Massie Case Defendants Set Free by Gov. Judd—House Nearly Ruins the Economy Bill—Capone Begins His Term in Atlanta.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

SWIFTLY and unexpectedly came the climax in the Massie case at Honolulu. Two days in advance of the time set for the passing of sentence on the four convicted of manslaughter in the killing of Kahahawai, Judge Davis called the defendants before him and sentenced them to ten years in prison at hard labor. Immediately thereafter Gov. Lawrence M. Judd commuted the sentence to one hour in the custody of a bailiff, and this time having passed, the navy lieutenant, his mother-in-law, Mrs. Fortescue, and Seamen Lord and Jones were set free. This procedure was in accord with an arrangement made by Governor Judd, Judge Davis and attorneys on both sides. The governor had been subjected to great pressure to pardon the defendants, and it was held that his action was in accord with the jury's recommendation of mercy.

Gov. Judd

Sentiment in Hawaii was diverse, many of the natives being extremely dissatisfied with what they considered a miscarriage of justice, and most of the whites feeling that the governor should have pardoned the four outright, thus preserving their civil rights. In Washington the latter view seemed to prevail, several senators and representatives being outspoken in the matter. Congressman Summers of Texas introduced a bill granting the President power to pardon defendants in the territories, and before the action in Honolulu was known bills had been introduced in both houses for a congressional pardon for the four convicted. Also a petition for a pardon was signed by eighty members of congress and cabled to Governor Judd.

Whether Lieutenant Massie will remain in the navy apparently was left up to President Hoover. In cases where naval officers are convicted in civil courts and sentenced to imprisonment the naval regulations authorize the President to drop such officers. Naval officers in Washington were hopeful that Mr. Hoover would not take such action in Massie's case.

Dispatches from Honolulu said it was likely the prosecution of the four remaining youths accused of attacking Mrs. Massie would now be dropped. The young woman had said she was ready to go to the stand against them and once more tell of her terrible experience, but Clarence Darrow, her attorney, advised her to come home with her family and forget all about it.

WHEN the house of representatives, disregarding the leadership of both parties, got through mauling the economy measure that was designed to contribute $200,000,000 savings toward balancing the budget and handed it over to the senate as an amendment to the legislative appropriation bill, there wasn't much left of the product of the special economy committee. Indeed, it was about $160,000,000 short of the mark.

By limiting government pay reduction to 11 per cent of salaries in excess of $2,500 the house knocked out $55,000,000 of the $67,000,000 it was proposed to save on pay roll cost. The house also rejected savings on veterans' benefits estimated at more than $48,000,000 and turned down the proposed consolidation of the War and Navy departments which the economy committee promised would save from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000.

While administration leaders laid plans to salvage some of the wreckage on the senate floor, the appropriations committee was confronted with the task of revamping the shattered measure.

Meantime, prospects of lengthy contests over each side of the triangular problem of balancing the budget—taxation, reduction in appropriations and economy—cast a fresh shadow of doubt over probability of completing the necessary session work before June 10.

MARYLAND'S preferential primary was made interesting by the contest for delegates between President Hoover and Dr. Joseph I. France, the only avowed rival of Mr. Hoover for the Republican Presidential nomination. Though France is a Marylander and was that state's senator a dozen years ago, he was turned down by the home folks, losing to Hoover by a substantial majority. This setback, however, will not serve to put a stop to Doctor France's campaign. He will keep right on trying to corral delegates elsewhere and has engaged convention headquarters in a Chicago hotel. He is his own manager.

J. I. France

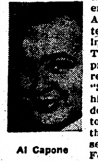
Baltimore voters paid more attention to the matter of repealing, so far as that city is concerned, Maryland's 200-year-old blue laws than to the Presidential choice. On this question they cast more than 142,000 ballots and the repeal was passed by a majority of 83,990. The repeal became immediately effective, so Baltimoreans may now transact business, go to movies or ball games and even kiss their wives on Sunday—all of which and much more was forbidden by the ancient blue laws.

CALIFORNIA Democrats dealt a rather severe blow to the aspirations of Governor Roosevelt, the third within a short time. In the preferential primary they gave Speaker John N. Garner a plurality of more than 40,000 votes over the New Yorker. Al Smith came in third, some 75,000 votes behind the Texan. Though Mr. Garner has not been an avowed candidate for the nomination, this makes him more than a favorite son and insures the continuation of the campaign in his behalf.

President Hoover was unopposed in the Republican primary and piled up a big vote.

In Alabama the slate of Democratic delegates instructed for Franklin D. Roosevelt beat the list of uninstructed delegates by about three to one. The New York governor also captured the South Dakota delegation. Republicans of the latter state favored a delegation instructed for Hoover and also voted to send Senator Peter Norbeck back to the senate, defeating Harry F. Brownell of Sioux Falls.

FOR several years, at least, the people of the United States need read little if anything about Al Capone, for that eminent gentleman is now behind the bars of the federal penitentiary at Atlanta, serving a term of 11 years for income tax fraud. The United States Supreme Court curtly refused to review "Scarface's" case and his attorneys could devise nothing more to keep him out of the penitentiary. His sentence, imposed by Federal Judge Wilkerson, is ten years in Atlanta and one year in a county jail, besides a fine of $50,000. If Al behaves himself he may be free again in about seven and one-half years, but it is unlikely that he will ever again be a power in the world of gangsters.



Al Capone

On leaving Chicago, where he had been in jail for six months, Capone said, graciously, that he was not sore at anybody and that he hoped Chicago would be better off and the public clamor would be satisfied.

FOR about ten years there has been before congress, in one form or another, a measure designed to make steady the value of the dollar. The other day the house, after brief consideration, passed such a bill, known as the Goldsborough bill, and turned it over to the senate, where it seems doomed to defeat by the Republican majority. The proponents of this measure say it will restore the purchasing power of the dollar and stabilize commodity prices through the open market operations and rediscount facilities of the federal reserve system.

The bill declares it to be "the policy of the United States," that the average purchasing power of the dollar based on the 1921-1929 level of commodity prices, "shall be restored and maintained by the control of the volume of credit and currency." It charges the federal reserve board, the federal reserve banks and secretary of the treasury with the duty of "making effective this policy."

Opponents of the measure, who include Secretary of the Treasury Mills, say it is "a mandate to the federal reserve board to issue fiat money," and "the greatest scheme of inflation ever proposed in any country."

SENATOR CARL HAYDEN of Arizona put forward a project of the silver states to boost the price of silver, offering a resolution that would authorize the President to accept, up to July 1, 1936, silver in payment of debts owing the United States by foreign governments. The silver would be accepted at the rate of one and one-half ounces for each dollar of indebtedness discharged, provided the debtor nations agree to not melt or debase their own coins to obtain silver for debt payments.

As a further inducement to debtor nations, the resolution stipulates that when a government satisfies the President it will restore all of its silver coinage to a fineness of at least nine-tenths silver, or shall otherwise increase the use of silver for coinage purposes the President may accept silver payments from such government at the rate of one ounce of silver for each dollar of indebtedness. The silver so received by the United States shall be coined into standard silver dollars and deposited in the treasury, and silver certificates issued against the silver coinage

PRELIMINARY elections in France indicated that Premier Tardieu might be ousted and a liberal government installed with Edouard Herriot, veteran leader of the Radical Socialists and former premier, at its head. The issue was to be decided in the run-off elections May 8, but already Herriot's party had made gains in parliamentary seats and the left Republicans led by Tardieu had lost heavily. Tardieu himself was re-elected by a sound majority, and so were most of the members of his cabinet.

REPRESENTATIVES of the Japanese and Chinese governments, propped up in their hospital beds, signed an agreement which ended hostilities in the Shanghai area.

A Japanese surgeon amputated the right leg of Minister Mamoru Shigemitsu soon after he signed the agreement. He was the most seriously hurt of the five highest Japanese officials who were wounded in a recent bombing.

The Japanese volunteered to start withdrawal of their troops at once "as the first step in the faithful execution of the agreement." Withdrawal is to be completed in about four weeks.

In Manchuria the Japanese claimed to have routed the Chinese "insurgents" in bloody encounters, but the revolt against the puppet Manchurian government was not quelled. The League of Nations investigating commission in a preliminary report said every vestige of Chinese authority in Manchuria had been erased by the Japanese, that banditry was on the increase and there was "loss of life, destruction of property and a general sense of insecurity."

SEVERAL highly important decisions were handed down by the United States Supreme court. One of them, read by Justice Benjamin Cardozo, rejected modification of the packers' consent decree of 1920 to permit packers to deal at wholesale in groceries and other lines not related to the packing-house industry. In January, 1931, the District of Columbia authorized the modification. Under the Supreme court's ruling, the packers will be prohibited from continuing in their present lines of business and must comply with the terms of the consent decree, which restricted their activities exclusively to meat and other slaughter-house products.

Justice Cardozo

The tremendous business of the packers was emphasized by Justice Cardozo, who pointed out that the original decree was insisted on because of fear that the companies would otherwise be able to crush their smaller rivals. He said the packers were in a position today to do under the modified decree what was feared when the consent decree was entered. Justices Butler and Van Devanter dissented.

Ruling on a case from Texas, the court decided, 5 to 4, that the state Democratic executive committee had acted illegally in barring negroes from participating in the party's primaries. The majority opinion, handed down by Justice Cardozo, and concurred in by Chief Justice Hughes and Justices Brandeis, Stone and Roberts, held that the party committee lacked this power even though authorized by statute to prescribe the requirements for party membership.

President Hoover was upheld in his controversy with the senate over the case of his appointment of George Otis Smith to the federal power commission. The case arose when, in December, 1930, the senate consented to Smith's appointment, then in January, 1931, requested the return of the nomination and voted to reconsider its vote of consent. During the interim, Smith had angered radical senators by dismissing certain power commission employees. The President refused to accede to the senate's request.

HOPE for an adequate American navy was revived when the senate by a vote of 46 to 25 made unfinished business the Hale bill authorizing construction of all ships needed to bring the fleet up to the tonnage limits of the London and Washington naval treaties. The measure undoubtedly will be roughly treated by senators who advocate other legislation and will be displaced from time to time, but Senator Hale expressed confidence that it will come to a vote and be passed before congress adjourns. The opposition seeks to prevent early enactment of the bill on the ground that its passage would embarrass the American delegation in the disarmament conference at Geneva and violate the spirit of the naval building truce.

WASHINGTON Cathedral on Mount St. Albans, the foundation stone of which was laid 25 years ago, was opened for public worship on Thursday, Ascension day.

The first service was held in the morning in the choir and sanctuary, the first portion of the main building to be completed, and was attended by the President and Mrs. Hoover and Mrs. Woodrow Wilson, widow of the war President, whose tomb is in the Bethlehem chapel.

Bishops of the Episcopal church, other religious and lay leaders from all parts of the country and representatives of all ranks of official life in Washington also gathered for the opening of the beautiful edifice.

They've Never Tasted a Tonic!

THESE are not patent medicine children. Their appetite needs no coaxing. Their tongues are never coated, cheeks never pale. And their bowels move just like clockwork, because they have never been given a habit-forming laxative.

You can have children like this—and be as healthy yourself—if you follow the advice of a famous family physician. Stimulate the vital organs. The strongest of them need help at times. If they don't get it, they grow sluggish. Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin is a mild, safe stimulant.

When a youngster doesn't do well at school, it may be the liver that's lazy. Often the bowels hold enough poisonous waste to dull the senses! A spoonful of delicious syrup pepsin once or twice a week will avoid all this. It contains fresh laxative herbs, active senna, and pure pepsin, and does a world of good to any system—young or old. You can always get this fine prescriptional preparation at any drug store. Just ask them for Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin.

Get some syrup pepsin today, and protect your family from those bilious days, frequent sick spells and colds. Keep a bottle in the medicine chest instead of cathartics that so often bring on chronic constipation. Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin can always be employed to give clogged bowels a thorough cleansing, with none of that painful griping, or burning feeling afterward. It isn't expensive.

Why Worry?

WHEN you lose your appetite—not only for food . . . but for work and play—don't merely go on worrying. Do something about it!

One of the most famous tonics for weakness, "nerves," and "run down condition," is Fellows' Syrup. It stimulates appetite. Lifts the entire bodily tone to higher levels of vigor and energy. The first few doses will prove that "Fellows" is the medicine for "building up." That is why so many doctors prescribe it. Ask your druggist for genuine

FELLOWS' SYRUP

Music Calms the Deranged

In the treatment of the insane patients at the Mercedes hospital in Buenos Aires, music has been found to be of great value in calming the disturbed minds and in giving the inmates something to occupy themselves with. Every opportunity has been given to cultivate any musical possibilities of the inmates. A band and orchestra have been organized for some time and solo performances both vocal and instrumental have been encouraged to the fullest extent. Renewed interest on the part of the performers has been aroused recently by broadcasting their programs. The performers were instantly spurred on to greater proficiency by the knowledge that their music was reaching their homes and friends outside. Many of the patients have learned to play with great skill and feeling.

Trappers in Luck

Three-quarters of a million pelts of Michigan fur-bearing animals, of which one-third were muskrat, are estimated to have brought farmers and trappers more than $650,000 at "depression prices" during 1930-31, says the department of observation.

"That's the stuff, miss," he said. "She'll do, doctor!"

They drew up before a comfortable, rambling country house with several outbuildings. In front of a square, brick tomb, windowless, stood a large sign: "Explosives! Keep away!" On another, "No smoking; this means you!" warned the careless. But the main house was like any other, only perhaps a little less tidy and comfortable.

The doctor stepped out briskly and rang the bell, his attendant at his side.

"Doctor Schaffner?" he asked of the gray-haired woman who opened the door. "This is Doctor Jarvis. I have brought a nurse with me."

"Oh, yes, sir," she said in a fatigued, listless voice, "he'll be down. If you'll excuse me—just step in. I know he expected some one—" She left them in a vaguely furnished hall, half office, half sitting room. Open doors to left and right showed dark linoleum floors; a gas range stood oddly in what would have been the drawing room; opposite, two long kitchen tables covered with dozens of little square pans filled a possible library. A strong, pungent odor floated out of a back room, from which an elderly man in a black rubber apron peered curiously at them, a glass pipkin in one hairy hand.

As they stood staring about them, steps sounded on the stairway and Doctor Schaffner came down, leaning frankly over the banister to get a quick sight of them.

"Why! It's not. . . . What do you want?" he said abruptly, striding toward them.

"Doctor Jarvis," said his guest, in a pleasant, low voice. "I found that Miss Lingstrom could get off last night, after all, and some friends of mine were coming down this way, so they brought us. I thought you'd be pleased if we made a little time."

"Yes, yes, indeed. Doctor Wentzel will be delighted," said Schaffner. "I I—this was rather a surprise, doctor! Friends, you say? I had—we had planned to meet you—but no doubt it's all right."

He extended his hand and Doctor Jarvis shook it heartily, though it was as cold as a fish and very nearly as limp.

"The doctor is upstairs," he said, "his rooms are there, you know. Will you come up, and the nurse, too? I—I should like to talk to the nurse a little, before—before—"

His voice faded out as he preceded them up the stairs. An open door at the top showed a room lined with shelves filled with hundreds of blue glass bottles, with here and there a brilliant ruby flask.

Suddenly they became aware of an excited voice behind the door at the end of the hall. A man with a pronounced German accent was explaining something angrily.

"But yes! But yes! I tell you, yes!" he shouted. "Led me eggsplain to you, for heffen's sake! It is not money— If you gave me a mill-i-on, I could do no more! Gan no voman have batience, effer?"

Schaffner went hastily up to the door and, knocking gently four times, opened it.

"Jarvis is here, doctor," he said softly. "Go in there, please," he added, turning to Coggeshall and pointing to a door on his right. Turning to obey him, she felt Mr. Wells' hand pulling her skirt, and as the door opened and a pale, plumpish man with red, inflamed eyes advanced to them, she was swept past him, close to Mr. Wells, into the room. An angry growl from the men and a rush were checked, together, by the maid's wailing cry.

"Oh, Mrs. White! Oh, madam! Is it really you? Oh, what, what happened?"

"Look out, I've got you covered!" cried Mr. Wells warningly, one hand in his pocket. "What's all this, professor? What have you done to Mrs. White?"

The plump man turned a confused face on his assistant.

"But who is this?" he asked huskily. "Here is not Jarvis! I haf neffer seen this man!"

"He said he was Jarvis," Schaffner replied sulkily. "God knows who he is! But it's just as I told you, doctor, you can't do this kind of thing. I warned you it was a mistake. Are you from Mr. White?"

"Mr. White is ill in bed," said Mr. Wells briefly. "I want to know whether Mrs. White wishes to return to him or whether she is here by her own desire. That's all. And I want her to tell me so, herself."

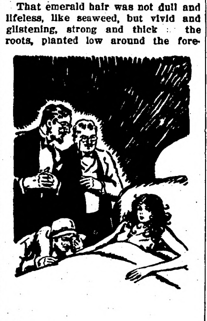
Doctor Wentzel fell backward into a chair outside the door. He sunk his head in his hands, and muttered something in a low, husky voice. Doctor Schaffner shrugged his shoulders and leaned against the wall.

Perhaps Mr. Motherwell was justified of his much discussed flair; perhaps he was not. In any case, after one look at the two men, he deliberately turned his back on them and walked into the room.

By the side of the clumsy double bed Coggeshall knelt, her head buried in the bedclothes. She was sobbing quietly, but quite uncontrollably. Motherwell's eyes, fastened on the bed, spread wide apart in frank amazement and horror. Inscrutable, usually, of feature, his mouth hung open weakly, like any street starer's.

The face of the woman who lay in the bed showed inflamed and sunken eyes, tightly closed, in a face so drawn and white that the skin appeared faintly greenish in comparison with the linen pillow. The cheeks and forehead were lined with numberless fine wrinkles; the lips were hardly colored. But the dreadful part of her, the thing that held the eye shocked and fascinated at once, was the hair that framed her face. For it poured and waved over the pillow, a shining flood of emerald green! Like vivid, swarming snakes it coiled and curled around her, and between the tendrils of it her ashen, pain-lined face was set in a mask of despair—the mask of Medusa, he thought, with a sudden shudder, as the horrid likeness jumped to his mind.

That emerald hair was not dull and lifeless, like seaweed, but vivid and glistening, strong and thick: the roots, planted low around the forehead. Its glossy strength seemed to have sucked all the vitality out of the body from which it grew. It was a nightmare of perverted beauty, a mockery of woman's charm.



It Was a Nightmare of Perverted Beauty, a Mockery of Woman's Charm.

"Good G—d, Schaffner," he muttered, "what's the matter with her?"

"I don't know," the other answered simply. "Wentzel doesn't know. Nobody knows."

"Can't you—isn't there anything?"

"He's been working on it since Wednesday—he hasn't slept six hours. Nobody in this country can touch him; he begins where men over here leave off. Who's to help him? It's too awful. Is that a maid of hers?"

Motherwell nodded, his eyes fastened on that dreadful masklike face.

"I see she's got hold of her hand. It probably put her to sleep for a bit. Come out here and I'll tell you about it—are you a doctor, by the way?"

"No," said Motherwell.

"Not that it matters much, really. He knows more than most doctors, you know. Only we felt—I felt, for he's lost his head completely, Mr.—"

"Wells."

"Yes, Wells. I felt that we simply must have some alibi—some certificate, you know—something—"

He yawned heavily.

"Keep a good watch on her, will you?" he said. "I'll be within call. Come this way, will you, Mr. Wells?"

They went softly across the hall. In the chair where they had left him sat Professor Wentzel, his head sunk on his chest, snoring.

"Leave him there—he's been working standing up, not to yield to it," Schaffner whispered. "I'd better explain to you, anyhow."

Trapped Muskrats

The story about the muskrat gnawing off its leg to escape from a trap is only partially true, trappers say. The fur bearer does not chew through the leg bone with its chisel-like teeth as is universally believed, but merely severs the flesh after the bone is broken by its floundering and struggles. Scores of three-legged and even two-legged muskrats are trapped every year. The stumps have healed perfectly, due to the cleansing action of the water. The front legs are the members most often missing.

Taking Chances

The teacher of the history class had been telling her pupils of the ancient Roman custom in which the bridegroom lifted the bride over the threshold to prevent her stumbling and bringing bad luck.

Just at that moment the bell rang and the class wit, who happened to be a favorite with the teacher, paused at the desk to pass his customary remarks.

"Gosh!" he exclaimed, "it'd be tough on him if he got a heavy woman!"

Bookcase Hint

If you have built-in bookcases on either side of your fireplace, you can show them off to good advantage by placing a little, low, bowl-shaped lamp on the top shelf of each side.

News of Minnesota
EVENTS of the week throughout the "State of Ten Thousand Lakes" told in brief form

St. Paul—Mayor-elect William Mahoney of St. Paul, swept into office at the municipal election here.

Waseca—Fire destroyed one business building and damaged two others with a total loss of $100,000 here.

Alberta—The new $40,000 fireproof school built here to replace the former structure destroyed by fire is ready fo occupancy.

Tracy—Mail service between Tracy and Marshall was resumed when a new star route was established between the two cities.

Hastings—One hundred twenty-two civil cases and 24 criminal cases are on the calendar to go before the May term of District Court.

Milaca—A tree in honor of George Washington was planted in Milaca Park by the Home Civic Club, assisted by members of the American Legion.

Staples—The Staples Commercial Club is sponsoring a plan to improve the appearance of lawns and dooryards in the city, for which prizes will be offered.

Morton—Fire at the Oscar White farm, north of here, destroyed the large barn and granary. Four horses and five calves and 1,500 bushels of corn were destroyed.

Minneapolis—New evidences of spring winged their way over Minneapolis in the form of 150 wild geese heading north to Canadian marshes and flying at about 500 feet.

Ivanhoe—Small grain planting, with the exception of flax, has been completed in this section of the state. Farmers now are making preparations for the planting of corn.

Detroit Lakes—The Fourth of July will be observed here this year under the sponsorship of the American Legion post. The celebration will be held at the Becker county fair grounds.

Duluth—There will be passenger boat service for tourists visiting the north shore of Lake Superior planning to go to Isle Royale, the famous island summer resort in Lake Superior, this summer.

Tyler—Interrupted in the midst of a holdup of the Citizens Aid State bank by a steam whistle alarm, four gunmen laid down a barrage of bullets along Main street and escaped with loot estimated at $2,000. No one was injured.

Hutchinson—Honoring the memory of deceased veterans, Hutchinson Legionnaires of Post No. 96 planted more than 130 elm trees, supplied by the park board, along Memory Drive extending from Memorial park to the top of College hill.

Baudette—The Minnesota conservation commission postponed until May 31 a hearing here on charges made against the state division of forestry and fire prevention by several large lumber and paper companies, alleging laxity in preventing fires. The hearing was to have been held May 5.

Minneapolis—Inquiries from tourists who are visiting Minnesota this summer are 50 per cent greater than at the same time last year, H. C. Hotaling, secretary of the Ten Thousand Lakes-Greater Minnesota association said. Between 300 and 450 inquiries are being received daily at the offices.

St. Paul—Minnesota's famous 10,000 lakes are staging a comeback. Greater than normal precipitation so far this year is bringing them slowly towards their former levels. E. V. Willard, state drainage commissioner, stated that while the lakes are not rising as rapidly as it was hoped, all are recovering to a certain extent.

St. Paul—Minnesota's 25 delegates to the republican national convention, elected by the state convention here will go to Chicago with positive instructions to vote for the renomination of President Hoover. Resolutions adopted unanimously by 879 delegates, representing 86 counties, indorsed the Hoover administration warmly and then gave the delegates their definite instructions.

Zumbrota—Citizens of Zumbrota have rallied to the cause of saving their historic covered bridge, the only one of its kind in Minnesota. The bridge, on Highway 58, will be moved into the Zumbrota fair grounds and preserved, probably as a 4-H club building. A fund of $300 was raised by Zumbrota residents to add to a like amount contributed by the highway department for moving the structure.

Minneapolis—Samuel R. Van Sant, Civil War veteran and former governor of Minnesota, was injured seriously when knocked down by an automobile here while out walking. He is expected to recover although he will be 88 May 11.

Fergus Falls—A yoke of oxen will head the parade here June 28 and 29 commemorating the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of this city. Earle Brown, Republican candidate for governor, has offered to furnish a team of blood red animals. Several other offers have been receiv—

BULGARIANS LIVE CLOSE TO NATURE

Primitive Simplicity in the Mountain Ranges.

In the midst of Bulgaria's numerous mountain chains, a large number of villages are picturesquely tucked away in their folds, and dotted here and there on their undulating slopes. There is a striking difference between the character and psychology of the peasants living in these mountainous regions and those who dwell on the plains near towns. Their mode of life is at complete variance; the soil is usually of a poorer quality, their holdings are smaller, and their culture is on a lower plane.

Through centuries of hard toil, under most adverse conditions, their material wants are most modest. In many ways they are almost self-supporting. Their daily food consists mainly of black bread, milk and cheese of their own production, while the wild fruits of the mountains, such as strawberries, blackberries, etc., help to relieve this monotonous menu.

Their clothing is homespun. It is made of coarse but most durable material, the wool being taken from their own sheep, and worked up into cloth by the women folk. Generally speaking they are not tillers of the soil in the real sense of the word, as they possess but scraggy patches of fertile soil which the women folk mainly cultivate for the personal needs of the family. The men folk and the small boys are in many cases shepherds and spend long periods roaming over the mountain valleys tending their flocks, away from every sound of civilization. These shepherds are always accompanied by their true and faithful friends, the sheep dogs who guard them and their flocks day and night, especially from wolves and other beasts of the forests which cover large sections of the Bulgarian mountains. The shepherds love their dogs as their children and the care given to their dumb friends is touching.

But while their bodies have not indulged in material luxuries, their minds and their soul have for centuries been alive to the wonders and beauties of God's earth. They have unconsciously drunk deep from the cup of nature, which accounts for their sturdy build and healthy bodies, their souls simple and true, while their hearts have remained pure and gay as those of the children. Because these children of the mountain have not yet been penetrated by modern education, they have also not learned to conceal their feelings, nor to deceive themselves as to the nature of their feelings. On the contrary these simple, almost illiterate shepherds possess a deep sense of feeling, especially for right or wrong; they can also love or hate and act accordingly.—Bulgarian British Review.

Viking Fishermen Cling to Old-Time Methods

Fishing is now one of the most highly organized industries in the world. But, although everything has been "speeded up," and mass production methods are used for catching fish, progress has not killed the old long-line fishermen of the Scandinavian countries.

These Vikings, direct descendants of the discoverers of America, go to sea in a vessel about the size of a trawler. On the fore deck there is a small engine, worked by steam and about the size of a typewriter.

This is a set of spools for winding up the line. The twine they use is no thicker than the string shop assistants use for tying up parcels, but it is strong, and there are miles of it on the spools.

At intervals all along the line there are long strings branching off, and at the end of each branch a hook, baited with a bit of fish. The number of hooks on one line may be anything from 1,000 to 5,000. The bait used is generally mussels, whelks, squid and herrings.

Record Swimming Pool

The swimming pool belonging to the park system of San Francisco is said to be the largest in the United States. It has a capacity of 6,000,000 gallons of water and will accommodate 10,000 bathers.

WHY
WHY DID A BABY STARVE ON THIS?
WHY DID THE SAME BABY THRIVE ON THIS?

Food elements in both were the same

CHEMICALLY, two baby foods can be exactly alike. The same percentage of carbohydrate, fat, protein, mineral salts. The same vitamins.

Yet on one, a baby may lose weight, grow thin and weak. And on the other, that same baby can flourish and gain and take on new life. What's the reason? . . . Digestibility.

Digestibility of prime importance!

Doctors know that a baby can starve on what is apparently the most perfectly "balanced" formula if his body cannot use the food elements it contains. Only a food which is easily and completely digested and assimilated can give to your baby the full amount of building material his little body needs.

Countless doctors and mothers have found this out through actual experience. And that is why Eagle Brand, over a period of 75 years, has won a marvelous reputation as an infant food. For Eagle Brand, next to mother's milk, is the easiest form of milk in all the world to digest. In baby's stomach, Eagle Brand forms soft, fine curds, like those formed by mother's milk. Every drop of Eagle Brand is quickly assimilated, goes quickly into the making of bones and teeth, muscle and tissue, energy and strength.

This milk can build 100% babies!

And what a builder Eagle Brand is! Recently, in a world-famous baby clinic, two physicians—specialists in their field—fed a group of 50 average babies on Eagle Brand for several months, to test its exact value in baby building. Bone structure was studied with the X-ray. Tooth development was watched. Weight and appetite were periodically recorded. Blood tests were made . . . and those 50 Eagle Brand babies, judged by every known test, proved themselves splendidly nourished.

This simple diet—Eagle Brand with the usual supplementary foods—had proved equal in every way to the building of 100% babies.*

What overwhelming proof that the mother whose own milk fails can put her baby on Eagle Brand with perfect confidence!

Try Eagle Brand. See the simple instructions on the label. And send for the new booklet "Baby's Welfare." It gives feeding schedules, full directions for baby's care, together with pictures and life stories of Eagle Brand babies.

*The usual supplementary foods, of course, are orange or tomato juice, and cod-liver oil or other source of the anti-rachitic vitamin D.

Thief Lake Opening Set for Friday June 3

A special invitation is extended to every Waltonian to attend the Dedicatory exercises at Thief Lake Friday, June 3, the concluding day of the Ninth Annual Minnesota Division Izaak Walton League, and to bring the family, particularly the boys and girls. But do not stop there -- bring your friends and interest them in true sportsmanship.

The reclamation of Thief Lake as a public shooting ground and refuge -- the dream of every sportsman for years -- is now a reality. Hunting, fishing and boating are assured the coming generation, the objective of the Izaak Walton League.

Delegates and visitors to the state convention at Crookston on June 1 and 2 will leave that city in a motorcade at 9 a. m., June and arrive at Thief Lake in time for lunch. The route will be thru Red Lake Falls and Thief River Falls to Holt; east to Mud Lake, where a short stop will be made so that the Conservation Commission and others may view what was once a great duck nesting, hatching and hunting grounds; thence to Thief Lake.

Boy Scouts will be on hand at the dam at Thief Lake to assist in the Flag Raising ceremony and Dedication.

Those taking part include Governor Floyd B. Olson; W. D. Stewart of Minneapolis, Director of Game and Fish; Wm. E. McEwen of Duluth, Chairman of the Minnesota Conservation; J. L. Wicks of Minneapolis, President of the Minnesota Division Izaak Walton League; H. C. Henderson of Washington, D.C., Assistant Chief of the Biological Survey; Captain C. F. Culler of LaCrosse, Wis., in charge of the federal fish hatchery; and other prominent sportsmen.

A total of $133,000 has been spent on the Thief Lake Project by the Minnesota Conservation Commission. The purpose of the trip to the lake is to acquaint sportsmen with what has been done for them.

Four hundred clipped Mallard ducks were sent to the lake this spring. They have attracted 40,000 wild ducks that have remained there to nest and care for their young, besides untold numbers that went on farther north and will stop on the southward flight this fall.

The department also planted $1,000 worth of celery, sage, wapato and millet seed, together with thousands of pike, pickerel and sucker fry.

Trap shooting will be a feature of the program at Thief Lake. Bring your guns and try your luck.

Dinner and lunches will be served by Ladies Aids of the Community and light refreshments may be obtained at the concession stands. And there will be plenty of music all day.

Tony Rhen and family moved into the living quarters at the telephone office on Friday.

Annual Meeting of Holt Holding Co.

The annual meeting of the Holt Holding Company will be held at the Community Hall at Holt, Minnesota on June 7, 1932, at 2 p. m., for the purpose of electing a board of directors and transact any other business that may come before the meeting.

Band Concert Was Well Enjoyed Here

The Holt Community Band, whose members include several of our businessmen and others from the village and many farm boys, made its first public appearance last Friday evening when they played at the Holt High School auditorium to a packed house.

A long but snappy program had been arranged for the occasion. The Band, the Holt Male Quartet and the Orchesta gave the people of this community two hours of the finest entertainment that has ever been rendered here.

We feel proud of our local organization and a lot of credit is due Rev. Redal for the time he has spent in instructing the band members in their work and we congratulate the boys upon their success. Every one who takes part in such a thing is a credit to the community in which he lives.

Supt. E. O. Nybakken filled in the ten minute intermission and he kept the crowd in good humor as well as saying a fine word for both Holt and our regular thirty piece Band.

In behalf of the band we want to thank the public for their support at this concert and assure you that everything possible is being done to get a bandstand erected so the boys can play outside at which time you will all be welcome to come to town and hear them play at free concerts. The proceeds taken in at the concert Friday night amounted to about $40 and will be used in paying for their big new sousaphone.

We hope to see a thousand people here on the evening that our band gives their first free outdoor concert.

1st & 2nd GRADES

The following poems were the best of the original poetry by the first grade children:

Little Flower

Prettiest little flower
How she likes to grow.
Children come to pick her up
Because they like her so.
—Yvonne Redal

The Dandelion

Pretty little dandelion,
What color are you?
If you do not know,
Should I tell you?

My flower is yellow,
My stem is green,
Wherever you look
I may be seen.—Junieve Larson

My Flower

I have a little flower
I like to see her grow.
She grows right by my window
Because I love her so.

Every morning I arise
I pick my little skirts.
I rise and run to see her grow
I love her so. —Harriet Wahlin

The Violet

Oh, pretty violet,
Are you made of blue?
Oh, no, little children,
I can't tell all of you.
—Stanley Haukeness

The following children had 100 in Spelling on Friday: Morris, Betty Louise, Rubin N., Russell, Ruby H., and Lois.

Grade I: Wayne, Roy, Junieve, Lillian, Elaine, Marian, Stanley, and Irene.

The second grade are having their final tests in Arithmetic and Language this week.

State Puts Up Hopper Fund

The state executive council Tuesday approved an emergency appropriation of $50,000 for grasshopper extermination.

The appropriation was voted by the council, sitting as the state board of relief, after A. G. Ruggles, state entomologist, and R. A. Trovatten, state commissioner of agriculture, informed the council the situation was serious and that funds were needed at once.

The money will be used for poison with the expectation that help may be obtained also from congress.

According to a survey made under the direction of Mr. Ruggles & Commissioner Trovatten, the greatest menace is in approximately 20 counties in northwestern Minnesota. Kittson and Marshall counties are in the most serious condition. Other counties ranging in the order of the number of grasshopper eggs are Polk, Norman, Clay, Pennington, Roseau, Becker, Wilkin, and Otter Tail, Mr. Ruggles stated.

The cost of poison bran is about 20 cents an acre, with 10 lbs. of bran to each acre.

H. Moberg shipped a carload of stock to St. Paul on Saturday.

Sons and Daughters of Sweden to Picnic

At a meeting held last Friday by the Board of Directors of the Sons and Daughters of Sweden it was decided to change the date of the annual picnic. It was the original intention to have this picnic on June 19th, but owing to the conflict with other picnics on that date it was thot best to change the date to June 26th. The annual picnic of the Sons and Daughters of Sweden will, therefore, be held on June 26th at the Tourist Park at Thief River Falls. Election of officers and other business will then be transacted. Further announcements will be made later.

MOUNTAIN CLIMBERS TRY ARDUOUS TASK

Attempt to Scale Lofty Summit of Mount McKinley.

Washington.—Climbing Mount McKinley, Alaska, the loftiest peak in North America, is a slow job. Four men set out from the headquarters of the Mount McKinley national park early in April in an effort to reach the 20,300-foot summit of the south peak of the mountain, a feat that has been accomplished only once—in 1913. If the present climbers find the task as arduous as the 1913 party did, they will not reach their goal until late May or early June.

"Physical form and its far north latitude are the two major factors that rank Mount McKinley among the most difficult of the earth's mountains to scale," says a bulletin from the National Geographic society. "The mountain's huge bulk rises abruptly above plateaus only 3,000 feet in altitude on the north and west sides, so that the crest is more than 17,000 feet above the base. All of the other mountain giants of the world rise from high plateaus, so that the portion to be climbed from a base camp is much higher in the case of McKinley.

"The snow line on such peaks as Mount Everest and Kinchinjunga in the Himalayas, and Aconcagua and Chimborazo in the Andes is very high; but because of its near-polar position, Mount McKinley's upper two-thirds is sheathed in snow and ice the year round. Above six or seven thousand feet climbers must trudge through snow or laboriously cut footholds in steep ice slopes. The contrast between mountain climbing in Alaska and the Tropics is so great that one mountaineer who made an unsuccessful attempt on Mount McKinley and later scaled a 20,000-foot peak in the Andes, declared that the latter feat required less exertion than reaching the 4,500-foot level on Mount McKinley.

"Piercing the moist skies of Alaska to such an extreme height, Mount McKinley catches tremendous quantities of snow. As a result it gives rise to numerous glaciers which feed the Susitna river and some of the headwaters of the Kuskoquim. The largest of the glaciers, Muldrow, is 35 miles long, more than twice the length of the most extensive glacier in the Alps. It is up the face of Muldrow glacier that the only feasible route to the summit of Mount McKinley has been found.

"This huge mountain of central Alaska was a famous landmark to the Indians. It was known to them as 'Denali,' which has been interpreted both as 'Most High' and 'Home of the Sun.' The Indians reverenced Denali as the natives near Mount Everest reverence that great peak.

"Little was known of Mount McKinley by the outside world until 1898 when the United States geological survey began a series of explorations following the gold rush to the Klondike. Efforts to climb the mountain from the south side were made at intervals from 1903 to 1910, all of them unsuccessful. The successful climb to the south peak, highest point on Mount McKinley, was made by Hudson Stuck, Episcopal archdeacon of the Yukon, and three companions, on June 7, 1913. This point has never been reached since, but in 1919 a party of four prospectors climbed to the slightly lower north peak.

"Mount McKinley lies 348 miles north of Seward on the coast, and 123 miles southeast of Fairbanks, Alaska's most important inland town. The mountain is surrounded by the Mount McKinley national park, 2,645 square miles in extent, which was created by congress in 1917 and enlarged in 1922. The park extends for 100 miles astride the Alaska range, and includes numerous peaks and glaciers, forests, meadows, streams, waterfalls, and lakes. The reservation abounds with big game, including moose, caribou, big-horn mountain sheep, and brown bears. On the hills and mountain slopes is a multitude of birds. The fish that throng the park streams in summer, migrate to large rivers before winter, for the small streams freeze almost solid. Ice disappears about mid-April, and during the height of the summer the region is bathed in sunlight for 18 hours or more each day.

"The federal-owned Alaska railway skirts the east end of the park. From McKinley Park station a graveled automobile highway penetrates into the park for 40 miles. This road is to be extended 35 miles during 1932. From the end of the highway a horseback trail leads to the foot of Muldrow glacier."

Famous English Bridge Is Auctioned Each Year

Boroughbridge, England. — The rights of the last remaining toll bridge in Somerset have been sold by auction, at a record price, while sand was running through an hour glass.

This quaint auction occurs every year and the highest bidder holds the right, for one year, of levying tolls on all vehicles crossing the bridge spanning the River Parrett, at Boroughbridge, on the main road between Taunton and Glastonbury.

The bridge was built in 1821 and is close to the spot where King Alfred is said to have burned the cakes in the shepherd's hut. The auction is conducted under special act of parliament passed when the bridge was built. The rights include the use of a pretty ivy-colored cottage for the toll-keeper. When the auction begins, a sand glass is set working and the highest bidder, when the sand has run through the glass three times, becomes the owner of the bridge, the toll gate and the cottage for one year.

The annual increase in the number of motor vehicles using the bridge has served to boost the bidding at the last few auctions, and the successful bidder at the recent sale, Charles Miller, a farmer, paid the record price for the rights. This was $1,100 more than the price last year.

Ohio Students Surpass on Lore of the Theater

Delaware, Ohio.—Out of the whole sphere of current events, Ohio Wesleyan university students are most familiar with affairs in the theaters, an examination given here revealed.

The class made a 79 per cent average in identifying actors and actresses. Several of them, however, believed Marc Connelly, author of "Green Pastures," was a baseball player.

Half the students did not know who was vice president of the United States. Other replies: Tom Mooney, a Democratic leader; Huey Long, a leader of Chinese armies; Francis Ouimet, French premier.

INDIA DRESSES UP IN OUR CASTOFFS

Greatest Consumer of American Old Clothes.

Every year the men, women and children of this vast subcontinent spend about $750,000 for castoff costumes, coats, gowns, suits, overcoats, shoes and socks once worn by America's millions.

No trousers are worn in India, so this garment is a drug on the market.

A $75 overcoat that may once have been worn by a wealthy American business man finds its way to the back of an Indian peasant, who wears it another ten years, but pays only $1.50 for it.

A rich silken robe that may once have adorned a Washington society woman finds its way into an Indian hut, where it gives cover to a famished Indian housewife, who pays about a dollar for it.

An Indian man is not particular whether the coat is a man's or woman's garment; nor has the Indian woman any prejudice against wearing a masculine article. All garments look alike to the destitute peasants.

A common laborer, earning about ten cents a day, may be seen wearing a full-dress suit with top hat, while an impecunious housewife may be observed wearing a stunning evening gown in her tiny smoky kitchen.

Historic Delaware State House Passes

Dover, Dela.—The Delaware state house, historic landmark of the Colonial states, will pass out of service soon giving place to a modern building.

A new capitol is now fast nearing completion and will be ready for use by the time the next regular session of the Delaware legislature convenes.

The original building is the second oldest state house in the country remaining in service. That at Annapolis, Md., is one of an earlier construction.

Since 1777 the Delaware house of representatives has been meeting in the old structure.

Season Opens for Air Flights Over Pacific

Seattle, Wash.—Applications are now being received by Valentine Gephart, official of the National Aeronautical association, from flyers who will attempt to span the Pacific and win a cash prize of $28,000.

Gephart announced that two Americans and a Japanese flyer had posted entry fees, the flights to be made either from Boeing field, Seattle, or Swan Island airport, Portland, Ore.

Applications can be made until June 1, Gephart stated.

Finds Cheap Way of Enriching Soil

Stimulation of Nodule Formation Advised by Ohio Expert.

Legumes lacking nodules rob the soils of valuable nitrogen in much the same way as do corn or oats, according to H. W. Batchelor, assistant professor of soils at the Ohio State university, who finds that nodule formation may be stimulated by inoculating the seed of such legumes as clover, alfalfa, soy beans, etc.

Inoculation of such seed, he says, tends to enrich the soil and may be accomplished at very little expense by using properly chosen field soil. Soil from fields producing soy beans having lots of nodules on their roots should be used in inoculating soy beans. Alfalfa may be inoculated with soil from fields producing good yields of either alfalfa or sweet clover, however, neither of these crops can be inoculated by soil from a field producing red clover.

After the desirable soil has been obtained, Batchelor suggests that the soil be sieved free from sticks and coarse sand or gravel, placed in the fertilized box of the grain drill, and sown at the rate of 100 to 150 pounds per acre in the row with the seed. This method has given very good results with soy beans.

Some farmers, he points out, do not have a satisfactory source of soil to use for inoculation, or prefer to use commercial preparations. Such preparations vary considerably in their effectiveness.

Kansas Farmer Has Way to Fallow Sandy Soil

Two fields of wheat stood side by side. One was taller than the other, and looked good for twice as much grain. E. E. Teagarden, extension agent in Stafford county Kansas, wondered what made the difference, so he drove back and asked Ralph Sultor, the owner.

"Well," explained Mr. Sultor, "my soil is so sandy that it would blow away if I fallowed it. I know that summer fallow will increase wheat yields, so I put that field in partial fallow. Corn was planted in every third row. The rows were far enough apart to till with wheat machinery, and the corn kept sand and dust in check. I will get twice as much wheat from the field that was in partial fallow, and I had a corn crop extra."

Mr. Teagarden asked permission to determine yields in co-operation with Kansas State college. The fallowed field made 39.8 bushels an acre and the one that had been continuously in wheat 17 bushels.—Capper's Farmer.

Feeding Pigs Cream

Cow testers in 12 Kansas associations tested 99 separators in December and found five that were leaving over .05 per cent of fat in the skimmilk. In one association where ten were tested, two were in the .05 per cent class. In a ten-cow herd that means 50 pounds or more of fat a year left in the skimmilk. That's too much cream to waste on the pigs.

Separators should be tested—especially those that have stood idle for a while. If you don't know how to do it, or don't have equipment, get your county agent or separator dealer to do it for you. Then adjust the separator and replace worn parts. Better get a new separator than operate the old one at a loss.—Farm Journal.

Soil Tests Important

It is important that farmers have samples of soil tested frequently to determine the lime need for legumes. A recent study indicated that there is a great difference between different types of soil and their ability to hold the lime after it has been once applied to sweeten the soil. On one soil type, a moderate application of limestone may suffice for many years, while, on another type, frequent applications may be necessary, even though the original requirement was the same in both cases. It seems, therefore, that it is a very practical plan for farmers to use the farm bureau regularly and have samples of soil tested for lime needs.—Rural New-Yorker.

Nation's Beef Cattle

Total number of beef cattle in the United States, January 1, 1931, was 35,980,000. The figures are taken from the 1931 Yearbook of Agriculture.

As the population of the United States is 122,698,190, this gives one beef cattle to every three and two-fifths persons.

The 11 far western states have 7,924,000 beef cattle, or 23 per cent of the total for the United States.

These 11 states have one beef cattle for every one and one-half persons, as against an average for the United States of one for three and two-fifths persons, or over twice the average.—Idaho Farmer.

Cornborer Parasites

In the last 10 years 20 different kinds of cornborer parasites have been imported into the United States from Europe and the Orient. Of these 12 have been recovered in the field, indicating that they have become established. So far control by this method has not had time to become effective, but in some fields as much as 15 to 25 per cent of parasitism has been found indicating that there is opportunity for further control through this method.—Parirle Farmer.

Part of Fertilizer in Farm Management

Means More Than Increase in Production.

The function of a fertilizer is to supply such plant food as the soil, unaided, is unable to supply. Fertilizer is a tool of crop production, to be used, like any other tool, when a profit can be made.

There are soils and conditions where other factors are so limiting that a profit from fertilizers is hopeless. But the majority of farmers who will combine the use of fertilizers with other good farm practices will find that fertilizers have an important place in a farm management program to reduce production costs and to give a greater labor return.

While increase in yield is usually the principal effect of fertilizers, other effects, such as improvement in quality, earlier start, earlier maturity, and greater disease resistance are frequently of equal value. Harder, more mature corn, earlier and plumper small grains, better grading potatoes, heavier heads of cabbage, better tobacco—these are common, rather than unusual effects of good fertilizer treatment.

Few Agricultural Pests Without Bird Enemies

The United States biological survey, in Farmers' Bulletin 1682-F, describes the "Usefulness of Birds on the Farm." W. L. McAtee, in charge of the bureau's division of food habits research, says that hardly an agricultural pest exists but has effective bird enemies. In Utah during an alfalfa weevil outbreak biological survey scientists found 45 species of birds attacking the pest. One killdeer's stomach examined in this investigation contained 383 individual weevils, and the contents of a brewer's blackbird's stomach showed that the bird had eaten 442 weevils, constituting 96 per cent of its food. The everyday services of birds in consuming insects of all kinds and holding back the threatening tide of insect life, are probably of even greater significance than their emergency help. A list published in the bulletin shows that the cotton-boll weevil has 66 bird enemies, the gypsy moth 46, the army worm 43, leaf hoppers 175, the potato beetle 34, and wireworms 205.—Rural New-Yorker.

Inoculate Legumes

Although legume seeds are cheaper this year than they have been, yet compared with prices of other farm crops, they still cost enough that farmers should use every effort to secure a good stand and best results. Inoculating the seed is an important step toward success. There are a number of good commercial inoculants on the market that should be used according to the directions of the manufacturer. Their use simplifies the job of inoculating. For those who wish to use dirt for inoculation, the easiest plan is to secure soil from a field where well inoculated plants were grown last year. This dirt is then mixed with water to the consistency of cream, and is mixed with the seed, care being taken that some of the mud gets on each seed. The seed is then dried and sown. After inoculation seed should be kept out of the sunlight.—Prairie Farmer.

Salt Box for Sheep

A salt box that will supply salt and at the same time apply tar to the noses of the sheep as described by one authority is four inches deep, six inches wide and four feet long. A board three and one-half inches wide, placed flatwise at the back of the trough and three inches from the bottom, runs the entire length of the trough. A strip of sheepskin, wool side out, is tacked to the edge of the three and one-half inch board. This is smeared with tar. The sheep, when they protrude their noses through this two and one-half inch space to secure the salt get their noses tarred. An A-shaped roof over this box high enough so as not to interfere with easy access to the salt will make it weather-proof.—Indiana Farmer's Guide.

Agricultural Squibs

Dead and weak colonies in the bee hive often indicate the presence of a disease called American foul brood.

• • •

• • •

Apple trees in sod need about one-quarter pound of nitrogen fertilizer annually for each year's growth, up to thirty years.

• • •

If the garden is carefully planned two vegetables a day will be provided for summer use and two vegetables a day can be canned or stored for winter use.

• • •

Deep and thorough preparations of the soil is required for sweet peas. Early planting is essential.

• • •

It is estimated by the American Tree association that there are 120,000,000 idle acres in the United States which are suitable only for trees.

• • •

Silage is good insurance against a period of scant feed. If the rainfall is sufficient to keep the pastures growing the silage may not be needed. In that case it can be kept over for the next season

Mercolized Wax Keeps Skin Young

Get an ounce and use as directed. Fine particles of aged skin peel off until all defects such as pimples, liver spots, tan and freckles disappear. Skin is then soft and velvety. Your face looks years younger. Mercolized Wax brings out the hidden beauty of your skin. To remove wrinkles use one ounce Powdered Saxolite dissolved in one-half pint witch hazel. At drug stores.

CHILD need REGULATING?

CASTORIA WILL DO IT!

When your child needs regulating, remember this: the organs of babies and children are delicate. Little bowels must be gently urged—never forced. That's why Castoria is used by so many doctors and mothers. It is specially made for children's ailments; contains no harsh, harmful drugs, no narcotics. You can safely give it to young infants for colic pains. Yet it is an equally effective regulator for older children. The next time your child has a little cold or fever, or a digestive upset, give him the help of Castoria, the children's own remedy. Genuine Castoria always has the name:

"I've been with the doctor seven years," Schaffner began, "ever since he came over here. He told me all about it, so that if anything ever happened to him, I could go on with it, you see. He knew her first in Paris, twelve years ago. Her hair was a dark auburn then, and beginning to go gray. She wasn't even pretty, then, he said, except that she had regular features and strange greenish eyes. But no color, and not attractive at all. He was only an operator and artificial hair worker in a little shop in Paris, and he happened to be the one to wait on her when she came in to consult about her hair—she couldn't afford to let it go gray, you know. She said they all did in her family. She was a kind of pupil teacher in a convent. Poor as a rat, of course. He did pretty well for her and she used to come in now and then.

"Well, he hit on something, one day, and he wanted to try it on somebody, so he offered this Miss Lee to make a regular red blond of her if she'd take the risk. She agreed, and he brought it up a few shades, to begin, and after that they got it where he wanted it—pretty nearly as where you saw it last, I imagine."

Motherwell nodded.

"It's been used, of course, enormously, since. But it never has had, in all these years, the wonderful results it had on her. He can't understand it. Nobody can. It's something in her constitution. She isn't like other people. She seemed to take it right into her system, he says, and it affected, gradually, the whole pigmentation. He says her eyebrows and lashes changed. I know her complexion has. He injected it, finally, hypodermically.

"Oh! You wouldn't understand. It doesn't matter, that part. The point is, she turned into a tremendous beauty. It was very much remarked, of course. He sold that formula to the biggest specialist in Paris and got enough to set up a little laboratory and do nothing but consultations. He was always interested in explosives, and the coaltars, you know, are all—"

Yawns stopped him.

"So then White met her, and she finished him at first sight. He came to the school to see some friend's child, I believe. She came straight to the professor and offered him five thousand a year to work in New York and take care of her. Of course he accepted. What does he care where he works? He took me on as assistant, and he's made a great name for himself among the chemists and inventors, the professor has. She's his only patient, you know. Not only did he promise her, but he doesn't want to touch that sort of thing, of course. We have all we can do."

He paused, and turning to a little electrical grill, lifted a coffee pot from it and poured himself a cup, handing another to his guest.

"Now—where was I? Oh, yes. Something's been happening to her. We think now it was taking the cure at White Sulphur, maybe. She wanted to lose some weight. And she admits that she went on one of those terrible diets the women read in little books—you know? Awful. Anyway, there's no doubt that the hair lost luster and her skin got a queer color. He changed her diet and strengthened the formula a little (he's always had a special one for her—the trade never had it) and she looked a little better, but the hair got streaked and yellow looking. He could cover that up, of course, but naturally she was getting worried.

"Last Wednesday there was a grayish tinge to it, she thought, more a sort of shadow than a color, she expressed it, and she lost her nerve and dashed over to our place and read him the riot act. He's told her often and often that she must be calm and keep everything 'in equilibrium,' as he calls it. He swears the mind has a great deal to do with the way the hair takes his formulas, you know, the professor does. Always has. Well, I wasn't there, but I feel assured that she got him pretty rattled, himself. Anyway, he told her he would give it a light bleach, if she wished, and refresh the whole thing all over again. He explained that it couldn't be absolutely guaranteed, but that he was reasonably sure of it. She was very anxious to try it, and he did it in the little inside laboratory we have there. It's a nervous job, you know—a seventeen volume bleach, and the tint and the rinse just so many minutes apart. You can't take any chances."

He took another cup of coffee.

"The water was pulled off," he went on in a lowered voice. "Somewhere in the building they began to use it, you see, and there's never enough pressure in those old places. The whole thing hung fire. He was nearly crazy—the color setting every second. It was almost auburn, he says, and he couldn't rinse fast enough, and he didn't dare show it to her. So he did something he's often and often done on test hair—artificial—and sprayed on a very light bleach of his own that nobody has. Do you know anything about permanganates?"

"Nothing," said Motherwell.

"I suppose not. It doesn't matter. He sprayed it and put her under the rinse—and it turned light emerald green in eight seconds! God knows how. She fainted and he had a hard time with her. Must have. He was all alone. Of course he had to get her out here—and there is where he lost his head. If only I had been there—surely, as I told him, there were ways . . . she could have called her husband by telephone, and said something—anything! He ought to have realized—but he was nearly crazy. He came right out with the truth, you see, and blurted out that it was unlikely he could do anything. That was fatal. But he said it was creeping down her forehead—as if her blood, he said, was green—my G—d!"

He drank again, thirstily.

"I tell you, that d—d color will not change!" he cried, his voice on edge. "There's nothing to do."

"But, heavens and earth," Motherwell burst in, "aren't there such things as wigs? You could—"

"Excuse me, but I can't argue with you," Schaffner began irritably. "I must ask you to believe that every possibility, every shade of possibility—"

He stopped, swallowed hard, and controlled himself.

"We had a dozen wigs and transformations out here in six hours," he said. "Think a moment—such hair against her skin! It was ghastly. She looked sixty. Her skin is like vellum; grain, firmness, contour—all gone! She has lost ten pounds. The pigmentation has completely altered. . . . There are no precedents!"

He gasped and wiped his forehead.

"But he has arrested the green in the skin," he went on, "thank G—d, that's over. We injected—well, you wouldn't know, and that was risk enough."

His eyes drooped.

"There is only one thing to do now," he said, his voice guttural with fatigue.

"The head must be shaved and a white wig fitted, and she must go home and make a clean breast of everything, and clear us from God knows what suspicions, Mr. Wells. We did our best—no one on earth can do more."

"Why, certainly, Doctor Schaffner. Anybody would agree with you," Motherwell assured him. "But why give everything up? Can't all this wear off, grow off? She is young, she has superb health, nature is on her side. Why a white wig?"

"She is forty-six years old," said Schaffner quietly. "It is no use. The game is played."

"A-a-ah!" Motherwell whistled slowly. "The deuce, you say!" He sipped his coffee.

"That—that makes a difference, doesn't it?" he said.

"It makes such a difference, Mr. Wells," Schaffner returned slowly, marking each word on the palm of his left hand with the fingers of his right, "that Mr. Crandall White will never lay eyes on his wife again, if you wish my opinion!"

Motherwell regarded him thoughtfully.

"You mean—"

"I mean that she looks at all this from a very businesslike point of view, Mr. Wells. She knows her husband very well, of course. You can't deny that! Well, she knows what he married her for. That's all."

"Oh!" said Motherwell, "I see."

"She has told the professor how it stands and he has told me. I don't talk with her much, you see. He's devoted to her, Mr. Wells. There's nothing he wouldn't do. Just think what she has done for him! He says he owes everything to her—and, in a way, he does. He might never have got his chance, without her. Lots of people don't, you know!"

"I know."

"Christening" Ship

The custom of breaking a bottle of champagne on the prow of a ship when it is launched is a relic of the ancient libation, which was practiced when ships were launched. The ancients consecrated the ship to the god whose image she bore. The action of blessing ships is alluded to by the monks of St. Denys. In July, 1418, the bishop of Bangor was sent to Southampton to bless the king's ship to insure successful voyage. In this country water or some other liquid has taken the place of wine since prohibition has gone into effect.

Not Through

Little Bobbie went to the school for the first time. When he came home in the afternoon all tired and apparently disgusted his grandfather said:

"Well, well, my little man! What did you learn today?"

"Nothing, Grandpop," answered Bobbie, with a sigh, "and I have to go back again tomorrow."

Stopping Lightning

Out of every 100 buildings struck by lightning only two are protected by lightning rods, reports the United States Department of Agriculture. Lightning causes the nation an annual fire loss of $12,000,000, and proper lightning protection could materially reduce this, the department says.

IN OTHER WORDS

Doris used to embarrass her mother every time she called on her friend by asking for something to eat. She was requested not to do so again. The next time they called on that friend, just before lunch time, Doris piped up:

"Mrs. Smith, are you hungry?"

"Nor, Doris," answered the hostess. "I'm not hungry."

"Well," said Doris, with a sigh, "I wish I was you."—New Outlook.

Obeyed to the Letter

"Now," said mother to Frank, "if they pass the cake a second time, you must say, 'No, thanks, I've had plenty,' and don't you forget it."

All went well with Frank until the hostess said, kindly, "Won't you have another piece of cake?"

"No, thanks. I've had enough, and don't you forget it," was the astonishing reply.—Tit-Bits.

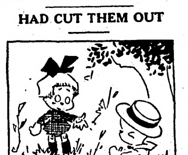
Conscientious Yegg

Sty-Eyed Stymie—Gus sure is a conscientious guy—he just returned $2,000 that he had stolen from the bank.

Bleary Barney—What's the grand idea?

Sty-Eyed Stymie—The morning after the robbery the bank president reported $18,000 stolen. Gus had really $20,000, so he sent back the extra $2,000 so the bank's books would balance.

HAD CUT THEM OUT



Little Ethel—Don't you like to play with paper dolls any more?

Little Willie—No. I cut them out long ago.

When Words Fail

Son—What does the word "chauffeur" mean?

Father—That is the name given to the driver of a motor car.

Son (after a moment's thought)—That was not the name you gave to the driver of the car that nearly ran over you yesterday.—Wall Street Journal.

Each to His Own

Husband—Would you like to go to the movies tonight, dear?

Wife—I'd love to, darling.

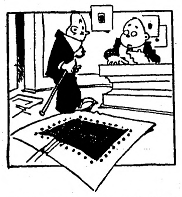
Husband—Righto! I'll go to the club.—Humorist.

Only Way to Get It

Saphead—I say, Gwennie, what would I have to give for just one little kiss?

Gwennie—Chloroform.

ON THE STAGE ONLY



"You act as your wife's leading man, I believe."

"Yes, but only on the stage."

Chance to Make Good

"Hello, is this the Better Business bureau?"

"Yes."

"Well, how'd you like to come down and make ours a little better?"—Wall Street Journal.

Going It

Mother—I'm afraid Robert is burning the candle at both ends.

Father—Huh! That boy has cut the candle in two and lit up all four ends.—Boston Transcript.

Two Charwomen Chat

"One thing, Mrs. Waggs, my husband will never go to jail for embezzling money."

"How do you know, Mrs. Taggs?"

"Nobody would trust him with a dime, Mrs. Waggs."

The Usual Procedure

Diner—You haven't given me my usual two pieces of steak.

Waiter—That's right, sir. I'll bring it right back to the cook to cut it in half, as he usually does.

Hints of General Interest

SELF-CONTROL is the best way to break yourself of the habit of biting your nails. It is dangerous as well as unsightly. Make a conscious effort to stay yourself whenever you feel you are going to bite your nails or cuticles. Wear gloves as often as possible and paint both the nail and cuticle with tincture of aloes or castor oil. Have any ragged edges of cuticle cut away carefully with a small cuticle scissors (this is far better than biting) and every night before retiring apply a little warm olive oil. Also push the cuticle back with your towel—gently—after washing the hands. When we consider what an important part the nails play in the reflection of personal loveliness, it seems well worth every effort to break ourselves of bad habits.

If you are not eating too much and your exercise routine is splendid, and you seem to be gaining weight, remember that you cannot sleep those excess pounds away. Cut out the afternoon nap, or at least cut it down. And eleven hours of sleep are not necessary for anyone in normal health. Those extra hours of rest are very conducive to the formation of those extra little lumps.

Frequent boils and headless bumps are not within my province to treat. The first step should be to consult with your physician, have a complete physical examination, tell him about your diet and your living habits, and he will be able to trace the cause and prescribe the necessary treatment. He will probably lance the boils—a procedure which has proven extremely successful in the past several years. Let me urge you not to squeeze the boils as you only subject the surrounding area to infection.

Outer loveliness built on the firm foundation of health and carefully tended and preserved by scientifically perfected beauty methods can bloom everlastingly. And where health and beauty abound, one reflects a wholesome joy in life—the head is held high, the spine is straight—lips and eyes smile, every task is undertaken with courage and optimism.

For today that "is the natural way of living." Today it is smart to be healthy—and being healthy our modern miss (and her more mature sister and mother, too) is beautiful as well.

• • •

Sleep

SHE was seeking beauty—earnestly—so she said, and the deep circles under her eyes were obstacles in the sure straight path leading to it.

"Do you get enough sleep—restful, restoring sleep?" I asked her.

Came a slow, hesitating "Well—yes—I guess so." I knew by the hesitancy that she was not telling the whole truth Asked whether she worried unnecessarily she replied—again slowly and not at all reassuringly—"Well—no—I don't see why I should."

Several days later her sister confirmed my suspicions. Not only was the subject of our story worrying about all the petty little things that every hour of every day brings, but she did not sleep sufficiently or restfully.

Circles under the eyes, puffiness, a dull, sleepy look, leaden-looking skin, tired-all-over feeling—these are only a few of the ways in which lack of sufficient, restful sleep manifests itself.

Chronic wakefulness can very easily become a habit—a beauty and health-robbing one. Many of our so-called nervous wrecks are men and women who formed this habit in youth.

Sound sleep is a splendid health and beauty tonic. And these rules should help you. First and foremost when you are ready to begin your night's sleep you put an end to the day's mental and physical activity, strain, worry.

Worry will disturb your sleep and keep you awake more than anything else known to man. Worry is the arch enemy of health and beauty. So—don't.

Other important factors in encouraging sleep are: airy rooms, proper ventilation, throw your windows open top and bottom, let fresh air fill every corner of your sleeping quarters. Make sure your bed is comfortable, too. A darkened room induces sleep. A very quiet room induces sleep. The sleeping room should have dull finished walls and dull furniture—high colors are not restful and shiny metals attract the light.

Avoid tea, coffee, or stimulating foods or beverages in the late evening. There are several snacks you can take at bedtime to help you sleep better. The old, reliable warm milk is a boon to those who value restful sleep. Munch a bit of celery, an apple, drink a glass of fresh fruit juice—orange or grapefruit or a mixture of both. The warm bath (not hot) is a good thing to take before retiring as it puts the body in an attitude of relaxation and induces sleep. Deep breathing is good. A brisk walk after dinner may help. Try as many of these tricks as you wish.

When You CAN'T QUIT

Fatigue is the signal to rest. Obey it if you can. When you can't, keep cool and carry-on in comfort.

Bayer Aspirin was meant for just such times, for it insures your comfort. Freedom from those pains that nag at nerves and wear you down. One tablet will block that threatening headache while it is still just a threat. Take two or three tablets when you've caught a cold, and that's usually the end of it.

Carry Bayer Aspirin when you travel. Have some at home and keep some at the office. Like an efficient secretary, it will often "save the day" and spare you many uncomfortable, unproductive hours. Perfectly harmless, so keep it handy, keep it in mind, and use it. No man of affairs can afford to ignore the score and more of uses explained in the proven directions. From a grumbling tooth to those rheumatic pains which seem almost to bend the bones, Bayer Aspirin is ready with its quick relief—and always works. Neuralgia. Neuritis. Any nagging, needless pain.

Bayer-Tablets of Aspirin
BAYER
Genuine

Get the genuine tablets, stamped with the Bayer cross. They are of perfect purity, absolute uniformity, and have the same action every time. Why experiment with imitations costing a few cents less? The saving is too little. There is too much at stake. But there is economy in the purchase of genuine Bayer Aspirin tablets in the large bottles.

NO TABLETS ARE GENUINE BAYER ASPIRIN WITHOUT THIS CROSS

Candle-Blowing Test

A candle-blowing test for tuberculosis is filling Turkish school children and their parents with a flurry of fear. Health inspectors line up all the children in a class at an equal distance from a lighted candle which they in turn try to blow out. Those whose puffs are successful are considered safe as to lungs; those who fail to extinguish the flames are catalogued as tubercular suspects, and their parents are warned.

How One Woman Lost 10 Lbs. in a Week

Mrs. Betty Luedeke of Dayton writes: "I am using Kruschen to reduce weight—I lost 10 pounds in one week and cannot say too much to recommend it."

To take off fat easily, SAFELY and HARMLESSLY—take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen in a glass of hot water in the morning before breakfast—it is the safe way to lose unsightly fat and one bottle that lasts 4 weeks costs but a trifle. Get it at any drugstore in America. If this first bottle fails to convince you this is the safest way to lose fat—money back.

But be sure and get Kruschen Salts—imitations are numerous and you must safeguard your health.

The Desert's Price

By William MacLeod Raine

A story of the cattle range, a tale of feud and romance. For years the McCanns and the Starks have openly carried on a bitter feud. When Julia Stark comes home from school in Los Angeles and sees William McCann, there is the call of youth to youth. Then old Stark is found dead with a bullet hole in his temple and young McCann standing by. Almost simultaneously there is a shot and McCann falls. Enemies though they are, Julia nurses him back to life. Despising him for what she believes he did, yet loving him for himself—she works out her own romance.

William MacLeod Raine has given us a story of a desert feud, of lives filled with active living, with great hates, great adventures, great loves—a story which holds the reader to the interest of the rapidly developing plot.

It will run serially in these columns and you will want to read it. Watch for the opening chapters.

Short Course

Members of 4-H clubs are looking forward to the Annual Junior Short Course, which will be held at the Northwest School June 14, 15, and 16. Based upon advance registration, J. W. Mlinar, school registrar, expects over four hundred boys and girls to enroll for instructions in club projects and for the outing and recreational program.

Boys and girls will have an opportunity to attend classes in which they are most interested, including livestock, crops, and home economics work. The instructions will cover feeding, care and management, fitting and showing, and judging practice in the various livestock classes and poultry. Judging and selecting exhibits of corn, potatoes, and vegetables will be included in the crops work. In home economics, the discussion will center around cooking, canning, and clothing.

District club leader H. A. Pflughoeft states that many junior and adult leaders are planning to attend.

An athletic tournament under the direction of Coach R. J. Christgau will be a feature of the recreational program.

Counties may enter teams in kittenball, volley ball, basketball, horseshoe, swimming and field events. One-act plays and movies will furnish entertainment for the evening program.

Members of the Northwest School staff will be assisted by T. A. Erickson and Mildred Schenck of the State Club department and county agents from Northwestern Minnesota counties.

Livestock Feeders' Day has been announced for June 14, this being the opening day of the Short Course. Other special events to be held during the summer include the Women's Camp June 20-23 and Crops and Soils Day, July 28.

Camp Meeting

Old fashioned camp meeting in the big Gospel tent located south of the schoolhouse in Holt, beginning June 5th and will continue for two weeks or longer.

Services every night except on Mondays, at 8 p. m., and, on Sundays at 2 and 8 o'clock p. m.

Special music and singing. Solos, duets, trios, etc., accompanied by various musical instruments. The "Old Fashioned Gospel" will be preached.

Services conducted by the Evangelists Mr. and Mrs. B. C. Heinze of Beresfore, S. D., and others.

Don't fail to attend these meetings. There is a welcome for everyone.

LINCOLN'S PET DOG INCLUDED IN STATUE

A magnificent dog is to be included in the heroic bronze statue of Abraham Lincoln which is to be erected this summer at Fort Wayne, Ind., by the Lincoln National Life Foundation. The hound was selected because of the Emancipator's great love for animals, especially dogs.

When Paul Manship, the noted sculptor, was searching for ideas to create a new Lincoln monument, depicting him as a Hoosier youth, he learned of many instances of Lincoln's kindness to animals. He would often go out of his way to help an animal in distress. One time when the family was moving from one place to another his dog, as usual, accompanied him. The animal grew suddenly timid and did not cross the stream with the rest of the party. but lagged behind, whimpering. Lincoln drove the wagon on for some distance, hoping the animal would have courage to follow, but when he was convinced that the dog would not do it, Lincoln turned back and went a considerable distance out of his way to lead the animal gently across the stream, for he declared, he could not rest if the dog was left forsaken and cold.

BIG SURVEY LEADS TO "BOY LINCOLN" STATUE

It required an exhaustive survey of all the Lincoln statues in the United States and Europe before the Lincoln National Life Foundation, Fort Wayne, Ind., could find the type that would be new and best suited to its Indiana surroundings. It is planned to have this new statue, now being completed at Brussels, Belgium, erected and dedicated at Fort Wayne this summer, according to Franklin B. Mead.

The completed bronze, heroic in size—it rises on its plinth and pedestal to a height of 24 feet—and classical in feeling, will portray the Emancipator as a youth of twenty-one, when he departed from Indiana after a residence of 14 years.

Send us the news.

Famous Ninth District American Legion Band to Play at the Fair

The Ninth District American Legion Band which will furnish the music at the Marshall County Fair and Ninth District American Legion Convention in Warren June 27, 28 and 29, was formed in 1929 and was the first band of its kind in the United States. The personnel at that time numbered betweed 60 and 70 pieces and by the natural process of elimination it decreased, until now the band numbers about 40 and is made up of most of the best Legion musicians in the district.

Twenty towns are represented in this organization and regular monthly meetings and rehearsals are held in one of these towns besides playing engagements at various other places. The combined mileage traveled to attend meetings and engagements totals 4,240 miles, exclusive of any engagement outside the Ninth District.

Since its organization this band has been feature attractions every year at the Red River Valley Winter Shows. In 1930 it was a headliner at the Minnesota State Fair. It has carried off honor at every Legion Convention it has attended, including the last two Minnesota State Legion Conventions.

The Ninth District Band boasts of two very capable leaders. Under the direction of T.W. Thorson, Crookston, the band has achieved a playing ability and technique second to none; and under L. Max Raines, Crookston, its baton twirling Drum Major, is ranked the best marching and best drilled unit in Legion Band competition.

To see and hear this band play will be only a small part of the big exposition arranged for Marshall County people at their 1932 fair. We urge you to begin making plans now to spend at least one day at the big fair and Legion Convention. Remember the date—June 27, 28 and 29 at Warren.

4-H Club to Meet

The Holt 4-H Club will meet at the Sunnyside schoolhouse on Friday evening, June 10.

A program will be given and lunch will be served at 5 cents a plate.

Anyone interested in going to the Short Course at Crookston is asked to come. Mr. Harrison and Mr. Pflughoeft are expected to be at this meeting.

Evans for Representative

E. M. Evans of Middle River was urged by prominent citizens of Marshall county some time ago to file for representative in the legislature for this county and, now in discussing politics he looms up as the outstanding condidate of the three that have filed.

The people in this community and Middle River as well as several other parts of the county are backing Mr. Evans strong.

Mr. and Mrs. R. A. Werner and Joseph G. Nelson entertained the school faculty and Messrs. Clifford Overum and Dennis Wegge at a weiner roast last Friday evening at the Werner farm. Kittenball was played, and the winners won.

Lutheran Young People Meet

Lutheran Young People of Northern Minnesota District will spend June 20 to 26 at the beautiful modern summer resort, Fair Hills, which is located ten miles from Detroit Lakes, just off old highway No. 30, on beautiful Lake Pelican. Here on a forty-acre tract of woodland the young people will enjoy exceptional recreational facilities, opportunities of pleasant companionship, and the instruction afforded by an excellent faculty.

Radio Program

A Radio Program will again be broadcast from the Grand Forks station KFJM on Monday June 6 at 4 p. m. Rev. R. E. Smith will be in charge. Listen in.

Attended Hopper Meeting

The countywide organization headed by Oscar Pearson from Warren stands ready to go out and poison hoppers as soon as they are hatching on a big scale.

Auto Smashup

Martin Seim had his Ford car damaged quite badly last Friday when he was driving home from town. An oil truck from Middle River which was coming back from Thief River hit the Ford broadside as Seim swung out and cut across the highway to go home a mile and a half north of town.

Annual Meeting of Holt Holding Co.

The annual meeting of the Holt Holding Company will be held at the Community Hall at Holt, Minnesota on June 7, 1932, at 2 p. m., for the purpose of electing a board of directors and transact any other business that may come before the meeting.

THEO. NESS, Sec'y

Statement from Selvig

To My Friends in the 9th District:

I need your help. The campaign for state-wide congressional nominations is too expensive for one who has been a schoolmaster until elected to Congress (and a congressman's salary doesn't leave as much as you think after all the inevitable expenses have been paid) and I can not aford to put on a big publicity campaign all over Minnesota. So I am going to ask each of you to sit down and write to a number of your friends in other parts of the state, by letter or post card, and ask them to include Selvig in the list of nine for whom they intend to vote. Do it now. Every letter like that will help.

Yours most sincerely,
Conrad G. Selvig.

NOTED CASTLE NOW RESTAURANT

Mansion Once a Favorite With Prussian Kings.

Potsdam.—One of Prussia's finest mansions, Castle Marquardt, near Potsdam, is the last victim of the economic crisis. In its heyday it was the favorite sojourn of Prussian kings, haunted by a ghost which historians now believe to have been a faked one. Castle Marquardt will be turned into a restaurant and week-end hotel because its present owner, a German industrialist, cannot afford its upkeep.

Castle Marquardt's history goes back to the Fifteenth century, when it was owned by the Baron Zabel von Schorin. In the following centuries it frequently changed hands.

In 1795 Castle Marquardt came into the possession of its most famous owner, Gen. von Bischofswerder, the declared favorite of King Frederick William II of Prussia. It was then that the ghost made its first appearance—a ghost which was to play a prominent role in Prussian history.

The ghostly apparition was first seen, or rather heard, in a small stone building, the so-called Blue grotto, adjoining Castle Marquardt. Hidden away among thick shrubbery in the beautiful Eighteenth century park, the interior was laid out with azure stones. The grotto received its only light from a costly crystal chandelier, which, together with the blue of the azure stones, produced mystic and beautiful color effects.

It was into this setting that Gen. von Bischofswerder used to lead the romantically inclined Prussian king to attend ghostly midnight sessions. As soon as the king entered the grotto mysterious off-stage music could be heard apparently coming from nowhere. When the ghostly tunes had subsided, the king would invariably address the ghost, asking him how best to rule the country. As if by magic, an invisible voice would answer in muffled whispers. More often than not the king would follow the apparently heaven sent counsel.

It was not long after the general's death that Castle Marquardt's pet ghost was unmasked. It was found that the Blue grotto, scene of the ghostly sessions, had double walls behind which a man of flesh and blood could comfortably hide, play a harp and answer any questions put to him. Thus, with the aid of a co-plotter, the crafty general for a while ruled the destinies of Prussia.

After changing hands several times, Castle Marquardt was finally bought by Dr. Peter Louis Ravene, descendant of an old French Protestant family which fled to Germany in the days of the wars of religion and received the special protection of the Prussian king. The present day Ravene is a leading industrialist. Hard times are forcing him now to let the historic mansion to a British wine merchant, who is turning it into a restaurant for Berlin's week-enders.

Another German palace, that of Count Hermann Griebenow in Berlin, has closed its gates and the luxurious building in rococo style will be sold at auction. In prewar days Count Griebenow, with a yearly income of $250,000, was one of the richest men in Germany. War inflation, and the crisis ate away the Griebenow fortune.

Hero of Plane Crash Is Given 4 Months in Jail

London.—During a flight over Iraq, in 1925, a Royal Air Force airplane crashed in flames from 4,000 feet. The pilot was badly burned and the observer, Ridley Oake Stanton, twenty-five, carried him through the desert for two days. The pilot died at a dressing station. Stanton was in a hospital for six months.

Early this year the same Stanton climbed over the roofs of several houses near marble arch and jumped ten feet from one roof to another, with a 50-foot drop between, to steal ten shillings' worth of jewelry.

He was bound over to be of good behavior, but normal life becomes dull to a man who must have thrills. Recently he climbed up an elevator shaft at St. John's wood, crawled along a narrow ledge to a bedroom window and stole a fur coat worth $1,250. He was sentenced to four months.

Burglars Steal Used False Teeth From Store

Memphis, Tenn.—Police are wondering what the burglar gained by taking two upper sets of second hand false teeth from the store operated by J. Cabay, furniture dealer. Nothing else was missed.

Bringing City Methods to Forests

Modern firefighting apparatus is introduced in remote mountain districts of British Columbia to combat the blazes that have proved so disastrous in the past. A number of these light trucks have been put into service by the Canadian government's parks department. The motor engine is used to operate the automatic pumps which can throw a powerful stream upon the blazing bush.

South Africa Offers a New Kind of Cow

Johannesburg, South Africa.—The farmers of South Africa are interested in a new hybrid on the ranch of Captain Helme, a settler of Westminster in Orange Free State.

A cross between an eland, one of Africa's giant antelopes, and an ordinary domestic Friesian cow has yielded the first authentic "Frieland."

This new hybrid promises to be an animal suitable for the more tropical regions of the continent.

Frat Initiates Member Voted in 56 Years Ago

Berkeley, Calif.—Fifty-six years after he was voted into membership, Dr. Edmond O'Neill, emeritus professor of chemistry at the University of California, was initiated into the Phi Delta Theta college fraternity.

Nearly three score years ago, when the professor was a sophomore at the university, he was pledged to the fraternity and accepted for membership. But, before the ceremony was performed, the Phi Delta Theta house was burned and all records destroyed.

It was five years later that the chapter again became active, and during that time, Professor O'Neill had been graduated from school.

His initiation was urged by alumni recently, so the professor, who was graduated in 1879, again became a "frosh" in the fraternity.

California Makes New Mark as Healthy State

Sacramento.—With a death rate of 11.3 per thousand population, California established the best health record in the history of the nation.

There were 67,513 deaths last year as compared to 66,178, an increase of only 1,335 despite an estimated gain in population of 200,000, records of the state department of public health show.

The state's death rate has decreased steadily since 1906 when the rate was 14.4 per thousand.

Royal Parrot Deletes Sea Quips From Talk

London.—King George's pet parrot is no longer a debutante. She is forty, and was bought in Port Said when the king was in the navy.

Originally, Charlotte knew some of the less publishable nautical phrases and talked a little French, but lately she has confined herself to asking visitors to the palace: "What about it?"

No More Tea Parties?

Boston.—Boston Harbor no longer may be used as a "wastebasket." A law, effective this month, prohibits throwing of refuse into the harbor, under penalty of fines of $20 to $100.

Test New Anemia Treatment

Experiments Being Watched by Medical Men.

Cincinnati.—New light has been thrown upon the cause and treatment of pernicious anemia by members of the staff of the college of medicine, University of Cincinnati, through investigations whose preliminary results were announced at the university.

Studies along this line have been carried out by Dr. Roger S. Morris, professor of internal medicine, and his associates. They emphasize that it is still in an experimental stage.

As a result of these observations a new treatment for pernicious anemia may be developed, the announcement stated. Medical authorities throughout the country are said to be watching the work with interest.

Findings will be reported by Doctor Morris in a paper to be presented before the Association of American Physicians, meeting at Atlantic City. Early stages of the work have been outlined in the Cincinnati Journal of Medicine and the Journal of the American Medical association.

Explained in nontechnical terms the medical college experiments have shown that when a concentrated solution of normal human gastric juice is given by intramuscular injection to anemia patients almost immediate improvement sets in.

Results are manifested by an increase in the number of red blood cells and hemoglobin, the coloring matter of the blood. There is also an increase in strength, gain in weight, and marked improvement in the general condition of the patient.

What effect it may produce on the spinal cord changes, frequently present in this disease, has not yet been determined. The investigation is expected to continue at least two years. The observations indicate a substance present in the gastric juice of normal individuals which tends to keep the red blood cells and hemoglobin at a normal level through stimulation of the bone marrow.

Apparently this substance is absent in cases of pernicious anemia. The lack of it probably accounts for the development of the anemia, the investigators believe.

The university scientists have named this substance "addisin," after Thomas Addisin, who described pernicious anemia in the first half of the Nineteenth century.

Horrors! Expert Says Helen's Feet Were Big

London.—Helen of Troy's face may have launched a thousand ships, but she probably had large feet, according to Dr. H. J. Van Praagh.

"It is difficult to imagine why small feet have always been considered a sign of beauty," he told the Incorporated society of Chiropodists. "Trilby had large feet and was proud of them. I believe also that Helen of Troy had large feet.

"Modern court shoes," he added, "are worth thousands of pounds a year to chiropodists."

Air Travel Advocate Never Rode in Plane

Cleveland, Ohio.—Congressman Robert Crosser of Cleveland, one of the nation's foremost advocates of air travel and author of the pending merchant air ship bill in the house of representatives, never has been up in an airplane. However, he has ridden in blimps and he considers this lighter lighter-than-air way of cruising one of the saftest, regarding it as the future way of getting to Europe, or Asia, in a great, big hurry.

Forest Rangers in West Will Carry Radio Sets

Pasadena, Calif. — Forest rangers working out of headquarters here will be equipped this year with portable receiving and transmitting radio sets strapped to their backs, Chief Dispatcher V. P. Vetter has revealed. Each receiving set will weigh only ten pounds, and will enable the fire fighters to keep in touch with headquarters. They were proved valuable in field work last year.

For the Children's Sake

By FANNIE HURST

(© by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.) (WNU Service)

ANN MEREDITH'S marriage was one of those runaway affairs.

She met Donald Mutrie on a Sunday and married him that day week.

Her friends and some of his, said Ann was too good for him. Meaning that up to the time of her marriage Donald had been what might be called a prodigious sower of wild oats.

Ann knew this, after a fashion, and her sweet eyes were alight with the determination to reform Donald. She married him for love. She could reform him with that love.

In whatever fashion Ann was to be the loser by this marriage, she bettered herself economically. Donald was a born money-maker. As his friends said of him, about everything he touched turned to gold. Donald even a little the worse for drink could turn a better bargain than most men in the power of their full faculties.

Ann up to the time of her marriage had been a sort of forewoman in a fairly large uptown department store of Urban City. One of those great shops of convenience that occasionally dot the residential districts of large towns. The kind of shops that cater to the housewife who does not have time for the long trip to the downtown districts.

After her marriage, Ann lived in a lovely stone-facaded, ten-room home in a residential district where heavy traffic was forbidden.

But almost from the first, the reformation did not pan out as Ann had dreamed it would. Donald was as set in his ways as he was wild in his ways. From the very first he began to come home roaring drunk two and three times a week. The lovely home that Ann had taken such pride in creating became a storm center of the most painful and difficult scenes from the very first. It was almost with horror that Ann regarded the coming of their first child. But for a while, about a year after its arrival, a change came about in Donald. He seemed humble, chastened, deeply contrite and in love with the mother of his lovely little daughter, and for a brief twelvemonth the pretty home became something of the thing Ann had dreamed it might be.

The coming of her second child was a period of happiness and thanksgiving for Ann. Life assumed a tranquility and a beauty. Donald, who could be very, very nice when he was nice, was not only the provider magnificent, but for three months after the coming of the little boy remained a devoted husband and father.

Then one night Donald came home drunk.

With her heart in her mouth Ann greeted this suddenly strange horror of a companion of hers and made up her mind to fight a valiant fight with him and nip in the bud the possibility of a return to his habits of debauchery. There were tears and reconciliation after that dreadful night. But something had snapped in Donald. Not only did the drinking continue, but Donald became untrue and faithless to Ann in the most flagrant and offensive sense of the word.

Poor Ann, sometimes she was obliged to hold her head up and pretend not to be seared with insult when these companions of Donald's passed her with him on the very streets of the city in which they lived.

The next five years of her life became a nightmare.

It was Ann's horror, it was Ann's humiliation to see her lovely children constantly subjected to the spectacle of a maudlin father and of home scenes of high, angry and bitter words that should never have reached their tender little ears.

In vain Ann sought to avoid these scenes, preferring often to suffer in silence than to subject her sensitive little girl and boy to the gross spectacle of a family row. Because that was all they could ever amount to, with Donald half crazed with drink and blear eyed from too much dissipation and too little sleep.

"Why doesn't she leave him?" said some of Ann's friends. On the other hand, those of her more conservative relations, owing to religious scruples and fear of public opinion, advised her to stick it out for the children's sake.

"For the children's sake" was a phrase that lay constantly on poor Ann's bitter lips. If not for her children, she would never have endured it. If not for the indignity of visiting upon these innocent little products of her unfortunate alliance the stigma of the public separation of their parents, Ann would have gone back to her old position long ago.

She did not crave divorce. She, too, had certain religious scruples, and, besides, it seemed to her that she could never again have sufficient faith in the married state to try it with another. No, Ann was not for divorce. All she secretly craved was respite from the indignities Donald continued to heap upon her and, above all, upon their children.

And yet in Ann's heart the fear for them of the stigma of separated parents was even greater.

For six years the condition waged. Little Adele, a blue-eyed doll of a child whom Donald adored when sober, had literally been reared in a home of snarling domestic tragedy. Bobbie, the boy, could tell by the sound of father's feet on the stairs when he was returning home drunk, and would run screaming and sobbing to his mother's side.

Gathering these babies to her, sometimes it seemed to Ann that her hands were dark with sin for having brought them into the world. What mattered it that their home was lavish? That their father, when sober, adored and pampered them?

The atmosphere of that home was drenched in horror. When their father came into it, he smirched his children by his very presence.

One evening, such a shocking scene took place in that home—when Donald returned to it in the company of one of the women of dreadful finery he was known to associate with—and entered the very room in which his children and wife were having their dinner—that without taking time to contemplate the results, Ann packed up her children, bag and baggage, and with them left the house.

She went back to a boarding house she had lived in during the years of her work in the uptown department store.

The next day Ann sent for her nurse from the house she had left, and engaged her to take care of the children in the rooming house while she sought out a position.

The old store was glad to take her back. At an increased salary, a sufficient increase to enable Ann to keep the nurse maid and leave her children in the care of this reputable woman while she went daily to her work.

It was not the ideal environment. But the two small boarding-house rooms responded to chintz and white paint, and when Ann returned to them evenings, she did so secure in the knowledge that her children's little ears would know only her loving greetings and that their little hearts could expand in an atmosphere of peace and love.

No, it is by no means the ideal solution. Ann's struggle is a bitter one. She will not accept help from Donald even for the children. But the two little rooms represent something that the big house never boasted. Tranquility. The secure knowledge that the delicate growing minds of her Bobbie and Adele will know only the sunlight of harmony and the kind of gentle environment that it is Ann's life hope to provide them with.

Now, as Ann looks back upon it all, upon the turbulence of the years, the agonized moments of indecision, the fear of making the break from the so-called security her husband's board-and-keep gave her in the community, she realizes that the cruel thing to her children would have been to remain with them there. Vassals to a father who could provide for them only with the material things of life. Prisoners in a home where their little spirits were hourly subjected to the withering environment of disharmony and ugliness.

Ann's children no longer hear words of bicker and anger. Ann's children no longer run terrified at the sound of a step upon the stair. Beauty thrives in those boarding-house rooms. The beauty of peace and contentment.

It is said of Donald Mutrie that he has since come to his senses and that a strangely sobered and regretful man is making every possible advance to his wife in the hope of regaining her confidence and resuming life with her on a sound and fresh basis.

Whatever Ann's ultimate decision, she starts for her work each morning with a high head and a high heart.

In her opinion she has kept her self-respect.

Survived Despite Lack of Hygienic Knowledge

Considering how little primitive man knew about hygiene, he managed to keep living, didn't he? It is this monumental fact that fortifies our belief in an overseeing and omnipresent Providence. Something must have preserved man in the midst of his ignorance and comparative helplessness. He died of his diseases, but somehow enough adults survived to carry on the race and increase it.

One has only to read Doctor Clendenning's eye-opening and mouth-opening (for the doctor is a humorist) article in the Forum to learn that ancient man, from the beginning, was full of physical faultiness. His disinterred bones show it; and many of the Egyptian mummies bear the marks of rheumatism. The ills of bad teeth resulted in the same maladies they do now—and Doctor Clendenning observes that at least one exalted Egyptian suffered from blackheads. Whether he employed sorcery or a face cream cannot now be determined, but either was futile.

Early man did not live long, but he "lived dangerously," as Nietzsche invites us to do. Whatever ailment he contracted, quickly killed him. Still the race "muddled through."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Tree's Commercial Value

The Spanish cedar is one of the most highly esteemed lumber trees of the West Indies. Its most important commercial use is for the manufacture of cigar boxes. Planted as a protection on the coffee trails it grows rapidly but not so large as to completely shade out the coffee plants.

Many of the large coffee-shading trees of various species were blown down by hurricanes of recent years. Old cedro trees 4 to 6 feet in diameter and 50 to 100 feet high were common in Porto Rico before the virgin forests of the island were cut.

WHY HOARD THINGS THE WORLD NEEDS?

We don't mean gold!

Why not quit hoarding sympathy? Let it flow freely. Why keep your emotions pent up? Why not give your nobler feelings a chance for circulation?

Why hoard kindness? It doesn't do you any good, much less your neighbor. These are the days when multitudes are down and out. Why not give those who are hungry for a little attention a handout? Why not give them the glad hand of applause? It will not impoverish you and it may make them rich.

Why hoard affection? The world is shriveling up and blowing away for want of it. The most pernicious anemia is that of a loveless life. It is the most fatal of all ailments and the most prevalent. Why forget anybody else is on earth? Let the big bruisers rush in and grab a fist full and run off pell-mell to lord it over others. They don't grab the finer things of life.

Hoarding gold is apt to result from hoarding the best elements of character. And the release of humanity among men may have the effect of setting the gold stream free.

So why not let up on hoarding at the fountain head? Why not cease hoarding where it will do some good? Why not allow the sunshine to melt down the hearts of stone? Why not thaw out the frozen sentiments of existence, so frozen assets may become liquid of their own accord?

Why not be a little more generous with faith and hope and love?—Los Angeles Times.

Roses for the Veterans

The mothers on the byways have looks of yearning sadness,
And helmets by the stairways flood homes with memories;
A sense of loss on gay days subdues the note of gladness,
While winter with its gray days moans through the lonely trees.

And fathers on the May days pin on their scarlet poppies,
And gratitude on pay days reminds of others' loss;
Read "Christ in Flanders" Sundays and pass around their copies,
Recall their boys in old days before they faced the cross.

Plant roses by the highways for boys that manned the trenches,
Place stars along the skyways for aces of the clouds,
And maples on the boulevards which grief with tears bedrenches;
Let cedars in lone graveyards guard those our love enshrouds.

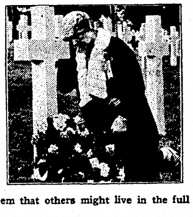
Put lilies by the bedside of boys with limp and scar;
And help them at the crossways where crowds rush by in scorning,
And open all the doorways from which marred limbs debar.

Forget-me-nots strew always along the veterans' marches,
And keep the tombs and memories of loyal heroes green;
So may the golden gateway, with glorious rainbow arches,
Bespan the veterans' roadway that leads to the Unseen.

Nation's Gold-Star Mothers



American gold-star mothers in France for visits to the graves of sons who died in the World war gave an impressive background last year for the most extensive observance of Memorial day yet held abroad.

Troops fired volleys in salute of the dead at the American cemeteries throughout France. Taps were sounded, and dignitaries spoke. But the feature of the day were the trips before and after the ceremonies by the war mothers to the graves of those they lost more than 11 years before.

At Suresnes cemetery, outside of Paris, Ambassador Edge made the principal address, referring to them as those "who had given those who were dearest to them that others might live in the full enjoyment of their liberty."

"You mothers instilled into these young men the principles for which they laid down their lives," he said. "You taught them the fundamentals of loyalty, courage, truth and vision. You with the fortitude which mothers throughout the ages have mustered, held your heads high as you bade them good-by.

"Let us look upon the myriads of crosses," he concluded, "and realize with poignant emotion the magnitude of our responsibility. We seem to see the heroes of Chateau Thierry, Belleau Wood, Thiaucourt, St. Mihiel and the Argonne pointing forward, forward; we seem to hear the great chorus of their voices calling to us to carry on until mankind breaks through the shadows and eternal peace dwells on earth."

Lesson of Memorial Day

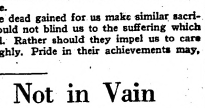
Memorial day is one of the most impressive, most touching and most typically American of the days we set apart. From earliest childhood one remembers the gathering of the old veterans, the march under the warm spring sun and the graveyard where gay flowers and the bright Stars and Stripes are placed at the headstones of the dead.

What hath this day deserved? What has it done
That it in golden letters should be set
Among the high tides of the calendar?

It is, indeed, an easier question for Shakespeare so to ask than for the average person to answer. The day symbolizes so much sacrifice and recalls those critical moments so rare in the history of a great nation that words and phrases too often fail. But if we cannot express all that the day embodies, we can let it remind us that from the birth of the Republic there have always been men and women who have so richly prized America that they were willing to give up their all that America might survive.

If the blessings of peace which these dead gained for us make similar sacrifices on our part unnecessary, they should not blind us to the suffering which the soldiers of '61, '98 and '17 endured. Rather should they impel us to care well for the country they prized so highly. Pride in their achievements may, indeed, be ours on this day.

Their Deaths Not in Vain



An eagle's nest, befouled with the remnants of dead things, the relics of grim slaughterings for the preservation of life and comfort is an unsightly and unsavory object, still from its squalor emerges in due time the golden eagle, most glorious, and grandest on the wing of all the birds.

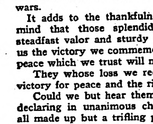
So from all the tragedies and sorrows of homes, fortunes and battlefields recalled to mind on Memorial day is, we trust, to come the promise of a peace which is to soar far above all possible prospects of wars.

It adds to the thankfulness to bear in mind that those splendid ones whose steadfast valor and sturdy vigor won for us the victory we commemorate, won also for us and the future a promise of a peace which we trust will never be ruptured by war.

They whose loss we recall by no means died in vain, since they won the victory for peace and the right.

Could we but hear them from their places of rest, they would doubtless be declaring in unanimous chorus, that their discomforts, sufferings and deaths all made up but a trifling price to pay for a peace, which will assure to mankind an ending of all wars.

Honor Both Blue and Gray



As Memorial day approaches and we prepare to observe the beautiful custom long since established of remembering the heroic dead it is interesting to read the account given by a leading newspaper of the inauguration of that custom.

In an editorial written in 1877 we read: "Preparations for observing Decoration day were carried in this year upon a far more extensive scale than ever before. For three or four years attempts have been made to effect a co-operation between the survivors of the Federal and the Confederate armies and to insure an equal honor to the remains of the deceased Northern and Southern soldiers and sailors. This year for the first time in history the veterans of both armies will march together through the streets to strew with flowers the graves of those who perished in the great war. Such an event marks a new epoch. It is the apotheosis of the revived feeling of brotherhood. There has been a great deal of oratory on this subject and some charming verses have been written, but now the banner of fraternity is flung to the breeze without hesitation and with faith in public approval. The Blue and the Gray clasp hands above the tomb of their fallen braves, and in the great future of this reunited country there is to be no resurrection of sectional feuds and dead and buried bitterness.

"The past is forgotten, and the country's future is everything. This is the lesson and the era of reconciliation."

"As she put it to him: would Mr. White, that could have married anybody, practically, in Europe or America, have picked out a woman of thirty-nine, with gray hair? That was what she was, you know. It's hard to know how any man would take such a blow—but a man like that! She couldn't face it. How many women could?"

"I don't know," said Motherwell, "I don't know, Schaffner, honestly!"

"Exactly. You don't know."

The doctor's voice grew thick and drowsy.

"Well, she does know. And she'd rather he remembered her. She's all through. She says we can't do anything, and she's right, we can't. It grows so deep over the forehead—you take her away—nothing can affect her skin, now—you can't live on coffee—" He was drunk with fatigue.

As Motherwell studied his worn face in silence, half scornful, half pitiful of his closed eyes, a clumping step rose on the wooden stairs. Schaffner, asleep now, heard nothing, but Motherwell listened through the open door and looked with interest at the hairy, foreign man who had peered out at them from the ground floor. He stood over in the doorway, one arm in a black oilcloth wristlet, extended.

"Enfin!" he cried in a rough excited growl. "Regardez-moi ca! I 'ave eet!"

In his hand dangled a long tress of horrid, emerald hair. Half its length was fit for Medusa's own head, but the lower half was pure, dead white.

"What you sink, eh?" he asked and showed it proudly to the young man.

Motherwell stared vaguely at it, then at the sleeping doctor. Shaking him gently he tried to rouse him.

"Wake up, doctor, wake up!" he said. "You're wanted!"

As Schaffner opened his eyes reluctantly, the man shook the particolored tress before them in silence.

The doctor's eyes focused slowly upon it; his whole tired face lifted and lightened as if by magic.

"White!" he cried incredulously. "Good G—d, he's got white! Do you see that? Do you see it?"

Leaping from his chair, he snatched the tress and ran down the hall to where the professor sprawled in his uncomfortable chair, sunk in sleep.

"Wentzel! Wake up! See what we've got!" he called in his ear. "Look at this! He's got white!"

In a flash of recollection, while the drowsy man struggled in his chair, Motherwell saw himself at a restaurant table and heard that voice: "Man, if we could get White, it would be worth a million to us!"

He chewed at his lip.

"Ah!" he said slowly. "Dot's goot! Ferry goot! Ferry goot, indeedt! He is goot boy, 'Dolph! Come, now, und go down. Bring her down."

Schaffner went into the bedroom and the professor, with swimming bloodshot eyes (like the eyes of a sick Newfoundland dog, Motherwell thought) stared at him and talked brokenly. He seemed to think he was addressing some old friend and fellow student.

"You see," he began confidently, "id vas only zeventeen volumes—how could I know id vould act zo? She is unique, dot voman. You know she hass neffer berspired—not von drop? Yes. No berspiration. Vot is dot for pores? Und berfectly healthy. If she rubs zilver—spoons or forks or no matter—id all comes black on her hands. Idiosyncratic, yes. Chemically idiosyncratic."

Out of the door came the nightmare woman that had been Clelia White, the beautiful, leaning on Coggeshall and Doctor Schaffner.

"But what good will it all be?" she was complaining in a fretful, broken voice—the voice of a woman no longer young, and sick with anxiety and fear.

"Much goot, much goot," the professor urged, and there was real tenderness and hope in his voice, "drust now to old Wentzel, old Wentzel who vould gif a handt off his wrist to help you! Now come, und you vill see it vill not be so dreadful any more!"

"You wait here—it won't be long," Schaffner threw back at Motherwell over his shoulder, and the strange, tired procession crept down the hall and disappeared.

CHAPTER VII

Motherwell lit a cigarette and stared at the empty chair in front of him, shaking his head, unconsciously. He had seen some strange sights, this young man, but never anything quite like this. Tragedy he could understand, comedy he could appreciate—but what was this? A grim little jest, perhaps—but there was a flavor of death in it, all the same. He smelt it in the air.

It might have been an hour before he heard any sound in the house beside the soft, dull thud of the pump in the cellar. Then came a hurrying woman's step, and Coggeshall, strange because of her dark, flushed face and tight, pressed lips, ran past him into the room, returning with an armful of clothes.

"Hairpins! hairpins!" he heard her muttering to herself. "Lord, I must have hairpins!"

He caught her as she bustled out.

"Is it all right?" he asked.

She looked at him stupidly, with an odd effect of trying to remember who he was.

"Just to think of it," she said slowly, "to think of it!"

She hurried down the hall and ten minutes passed.

As soon as he heard the sound of shuffling feet Motherwell threw away his cigarette, trod it carefully into ashes, stood up, and waited for them. They came back in the same order in which they had left him; the slim, leaning woman between Schaffner and the maid, the professor walking behind. The two men looked positively cheerful; relief from the worst had cleared their drowsiness away. As for the woman, she was more like a life-size ivory statue than anything else Motherwell could imagine.

Her colorless face was set in soft waves of hair as white as the white silk fringe that dripped from the waist and shoulders of her dress, a sort of classic robe of creamy, wrinkled crepe. Its texture was curiously like her skin, which, soft and fine as a child's, was at the same time delicately, amazingly wrinkled, from the "widow's peak" on her low forehead down to the base of her throat, where milky laces hid it. Her lips were barely pink, like the inner leaves of a tearose; her eyes, wide open and fixed far ahead of her, a pale, pale hazel with not a hint of the green that he had seen in her portrait. She was like a snow woman, with milk instead of blood in her veins.

She stopped at sight of him and turned to Coggeshall.

"When did this doctor come?" she asked in a soft broken voice. "Have I seen him?"

"My name is Wells, Mrs. White," said Motherwell, stepping forward with a slight bow, "I came down to see if I could be of any use."

"Oh! And you brought Coggeshall?"

He bowed again.

"I am glad to see you looking so well," he ventured, meeting her eyes frankly.

Her lips quivered a little.

"I shall never look well," she answered simply. "You know that, Doctor Wells."

"Oh, madam, you're lovely!" Coggeshall cried bravely. "And all in white, like that!"

"It doesn't matter," she said quietly, "really. Never mind it, please. How many other things did you bring me, Coggeshall?"

"Only a few, madam, but you have everything at home, you know—"

She looked at the maid, smiling slightly, and at that smile the woman's eyes widened and filled with tears.

"Oh, Mrs. White! Oh, no!" she cried, and Motherwell, watching that pale, remote creature, felt as if a little cold wind had blown over his heart.

She passed into the room and sat in a low-backed chair. Her head in her hand, she seemed to slip away from them all into the deep gulf of her thoughts . . . They watched her doubtfully.

But Motherwell roused himself and looked warningly at them.

"Can't you find some tea and—and something to eat for Mrs. White?" he asked the maid. "I'm certain it would do her good, after all this strain."

She nodded and hurried away. The two doctors glanced at each other, then at Motherwell, and stepped out, on a common impulse. He drew a chair near hers, and, leaning forward, took her hand in his.

"Mrs. White," he said, "listen to me. I know what you are thinking, but you should not. Can't you pity that poor man whose heart you are going to break? Can't you think of your husband?"

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Man of Many Attainments

Henry Martyn Robert, author of Robert's "Rules of Order," was a man of many attainments and accomplishments. A West Point graduate, he later was professor there of natural philosophy and of military engineering. He was a major of engineers in the Civil war, and later, as a major general, planned the fortifications of New York city and Philadelphia as well as coast defenses on the Atlantic and gulf coasts. He designed and supervised the erection of the Galveston sea wall. His rules of order, the standard authority on parliamentary law, was but an incident in his career.

Twain's Respect for Jews

In "My Father, Mark Twain," Clara Clemens says: "Arguments as to the virtues or non-virtures of the Jews were often the topic of discussion in our drawing room, and father always grew eloquent in defense of Christ's race. Indeed, so often were his remarks on this subject quoted that it was rumored at one time father himself was a Jew. About this time he wrote his article 'Concerning the Jews,' in which he states he considers them 'the most marvelous race the world ever produced.'"

When Husbands Slip

THIS woman's husband was run down, irritable, unhappy. She didn't know what was the matter with him. It worried her. She was afraid he would lose his job.

Her mother-in-law suggested she buy Fellows' Syrup and see that her husband took it regularly every day.

Outlines Six Steps for Land Use Plan

"Much lower prices for what he sells, higher prices for what he buys, and higher taxes—these are the upper and nether millstones which are slowly grinding the life out of rural America," said Prof. M. L. Wilson of Montana State College in a radio address, over an NBC network in the program of the National Advisory Council on Radio in Education. "Fortunately, there is a way out," Wilson stated, "but the way demands a reversal of the basic land policy of the nation."

The speaker presented six steps in a program for land utilization.

First in the list of six fundamentals suggested by Professor Wilson is the repeal of the Homestead Act and the enactment of a new national land policy bill which, he pointed out, is essential because there is no more land in the public domain suitable for farming and home building.

"Secondly, each state should classify its lands, develop a state-wide land use plan and institute a program of action," Professor Wilson advised. The third step is that poor land, as determined by land utilization studies, should be taken out of production.

Additional steps in the plan presented by Professor Wilson include the modification of land taxes and reorganization of local government; the withdrawal of poor lands from production to solve the surplus problem. Suggesting how this might be carried out, he explained the "Domestic Allotment Plan" which calls for the issuance of certain allotments to farmers to grow the kinds of crops they have been growing, the farmer to receive tariff protection on the alloted acres. Finally, Wilson recommended part time farming and the decentralization of industry.

To prevent men who are farming unsuitable land from joining the ranks of the unemployed, Professor Wilson stated that industry must adopt a new policy coupling industry with small farm agriculture. Small farms, located near industrial plants, he said, would not produce the great food staples of which there is a surplus.

Billion Acres Surveyed

Nearly a billion acres of farm lands in the United States have been mapped by soil surveyors of the United States Department of Agriculture. This area is greater than the combined area of European Germany, France, and Great Britain. The work is now progressing at the rate of more than 15,000,000 acres each year, and department officials estimate that between 20 and 30 years will be required to complete the survey. The cost of this work is between 2 and 3 cents an acre.

Watchful Waiting

Miracle Plays in Streets

Clergymen of England are proposing that, to bring religion to the man in the street who does not bother to go to church, there be revived the old idea of the religious or miracle plays, and produce them on city streets. They suggest that the plays could be staged on trucks placed at the end of blind streets. The sponsors of the ideas are certain that the productions would attract crowds, but their possible reaction is a question being discussed. Colonel Hamilton of the Salvation army told the Religious Drama society that slum audiences would have to be educated, as he was not certain as to what they would do. The success of open-air Shakespearean performances has encouraged the miracle-play backers and the idea may be tried this summer.

Ingenious Camouflage

A French lieutenant who served through the World war recently demonstrated in Paris the advantages of his new camouflage invention whereby, in a short time, a pedestrian or soldier can be transformed into a shock of grain, heap of leaves, a bunch of newspapers, tree stump or what not while walking. His name is Georges Felix, and his invention consists of a kind of a net that weighs less than a pound, and when not used for camouflage purposes can be employed in numerous other ways.

TUNA IN TINS

A Record-Breaking Catch which Means a Big Pack and a Big Bargain

FIFTEEN fish per minute—if some fisherman told you he pulled fish out that fast, what would you think? But it's true, in the annals of this record-breaking tuna catch.

In California, in 1930, tuna fish touched a new record with 1,937,134 cases canned. This exceeds by 496,090 cases the 1929 production which had set the previous high mark for the industry. Now is the time to get some of this large pack at bargain prices, since the 1931 tuna pack will be a short one.

In 1929 many factors contributed to the big catch. One was the discovery, recently, that new tuna banks existed on the ocean side of lower California. Bait boats flocked there and during certain periods 15 bait boats were catching 30 to 40 tons of tuna daily; and some individual fishermen landed tuna at the rate of 15 per minute. Another factor was the big, new and more effective ice-boat fleet, with more than a score of new additions during the year to round out a major fleet of slightly less than 100 of these long-cruising, refrigerated and Diesel-powered "clippers."

Prime Fish Only

A most important forward step in the tuna industry is the improved inspection service, which was also instituted in 1930. Packing plants have budgeted $65,000 for this inspection which is conducted under State auspices, and it involves careful scrutiny of the fish upon landing, and also a detailed report of the condition of the tuna as they are discharged and after the initial cooking. Only prime fish are included in the pack. Tuna fish canners have also adopted a system of examination and grading of the filled cans, and expert examiners discard all packages not coming up to the strict standards established.

If you are looking for recipes for using some of this big pack, don't delve into cook books that date back farther than 1903. For it was in that year that tuna fish was "invented" by canners. It was found that the hitherto unused albacore fish—the proper name for the tuna—could be steamed in such a way as to drive out its oil and make it taste like the breast meat of chicken. The instant demand for this delicious fish has made it a year-round food. The following tested recipes show its adaptability for main dishes as well as for salads and sandwiches.

New Recipes

Tuna Fish Soufflé: Add two cups of tuna fish, or the contents of one 1-pound can, to two cups of thick white sauce. Then add one tablespoon of lemon juice and the beaten yolks of six eggs. Fold in the stiffly-beaten whites of the six eggs, and pour into a buttered baking dish. Set in a pan of hot water and bake in a slow oven—325 degrees for forty to forty-five minutes, or until set. Serve at once. This serves eight persons.

Luncheon Tuna Fish Salad: Boil one and one-half cups of diced potatoes and one cup of diced carrots until tender. Drain. Add three-fourths cup of diced celery and three-fourths cup of diced canned stringless beans. Marinate all in French dressing thoroughly. Add two cups of flaked tuna fish, or the contents of one large can, mixing lightly so as not to make the consistency pasty. Moisten with mayonnaise.

Tuna Fish and Rice with Caper Sauce: Place a one-pound can of tuna fish in enough water to cover, and boil until thoroughly heated. Remove the tuna fish from the can without breaking the fish, and place in the center of a hot platter. Meanwhile boil one cup of rice as usual and drain. Pile the rice in a ring around the fish. Slice three hard-cooked eggs and arrange in a ring around the base of the rice. Add four tablespoons of capers to two cups of white sauce, and pour over the fish.

Tuna Salad Sandwich: Mix together the contents of a 7-ounce can of tuna fish, two tablespoons of chopped green pepper, one tablespoon of chopped pimiento, one-half cup of chopped celery, one-fourth teaspoon salt and four tablespoons of mayonnaise. Chill and spread between thinly-sliced buttered bread.

Pineapple Tuna Salad: Flake the contents of two 7-ounce cans of tuna fish. Marinate one-half cup of diced cucumber with one green pepper and add to the fish. Toss lightly with one cup of diced Hawaiian sliced pineapple. Add two tablespoons chopped sweet pickle to one-half cup mayonnaise and fold in. Serve on lettuce and add more of the pickle mayonnaise if desired.*

Experience Counts Big In Elacting a Congressman

We hear much about the disadvantage of being a "new man" in Congress. Committee assignments go to the older members. Chairmanships are awarded according to length of Service. New members must get aquainted with the departments. When the Democrats took control of the House of Representatives last December, they took control of all committees. What will happen in Minnesota if all the members of Congress selected this June and in November are "new men" is just this: members who have had experience and who serve on important committeee will be replaced by inexperienced beginners who will be assigned to committees of no importance or influence.

Suppose our present Congressman C. G. Selvig, is not nominated on June 20th, in the Republican primaries. Northwestern Minnesota will be "out in the cold", so far as having any assurance of a Congressman in the next Congress. The people here will have to look elsewhere for the service they have been receiving from a Congressman selected from this locality. Will they get in? We hardly think so.

The Republicans will nominate nine candidates in the primary election June 20th. We believe that the Ninth District and other parts of this section of the state are entitled to one of the nine nominees. Selvig is at Washington, where Congress is in session. That is where he belongs. He is not neglecting his official duties there, in order to come back to Minnesota and make a campaign for his nomination. If he is to be nominated, and if Northwestern Minnesota, is to be represented on the November ticket, Selvig's friends have some real work ahead of them. The people of this district must wake up, and ask their friends in other sections of Minnesota to give their support. Out of a list of thirty-two candidates; it is but fair that our candidate be selected as one of the winners at the primary election.

Northwest Scoool Lowers Board and Tuition Charges

In line with the policy of assisting worthy young men and women to continue their education, board and fee charges have been materially reduced at the Northwest School of Agriculture effective at the opening of the fall term.

Board charges have been reduced from $4.00 to $3.50 per week; health fee from $3.00 to $2.00 per term, and the entertainment fee lowered from $2.50 to $2.00 per term.

The entire cost of board, room, flat laundry, books, fees, and entertainment for the six months term, October thru March, will therefore average $130.00 per student as compared to $145.00 last year.

It is expected that the reduced expense will enable an increasing number of young people to take advantage of the unusual opportunity afforded by the well trained teaching staff and modern equipment of the "School of Service".

Statement from Selvig

To My Friends in the 9th District:

I need your help. The campaign for state-wide congressional nominations is too expensive for one who has been a schoolmaster until elected to Congress (and a congressman's salary doesn't leave as much as you think after all the inevitable expenses have been paid) and I can not aford to put on a big publicity campaign all over Minnesota. So I am going to ask each of you to sit down and write to a number of your friends in other parts of the state, by letter or post card, and ask them to include Selvig in the list of nine for whom they intend to vote. Do it now. Every letter like that will help.

Yours most sincerely,
Conrad G. Selvig.

Mud Lake Farmers Resent Izaak Walton League Action

Some of the farmers out in Mud Lake were quite put out over the signs that the Izaak Walton League posted out there on Friday morning when representatives of that league motored up from Crookston thru Mud Lake to Thief Lake to re-dedicate that duck pond.

One sign posted on the Wilson Schoolhouse which read "Abandoned Schoolhouse" was the one that started the sore feeling, as the people out there had eight months of school there this last year and Clarence Doran had a dozen pupils attending. Another sign posted near a steel bridge by the Knut Nelson farm read "Another Bond Issue Shot to Hell." This sign could just as well have been posted near the shore of Thief Lake and still not tell a lie.

The people out in Mud Lake consider it poor sportsmanship to try to high-jack the lake bottom away from them by misrepresentation of this kind—by trying to show the public that everything out there is lost and vacated.

We can go further and state that if they want to help the people in Mud Lake, they can fix up their roads and leave them alone: We believe that they have paid enough taxes out there to receive a little consideration and respect.

As the thing stands now the majority of the people out in Mud Lake as well as here would fight to the last ditch rather than see Mud Lake converted into a paradise for a few hunters.

Mud Lake is the bread basket of this community. It produces most of the feed, hay and livestock that is raised in eastern Marshall county and has some of the best people farming in it. Therefore, as citizens of this country, they should be accorded all the rights of such citizens, and not have their home territory all plastered up with false signs and misleading advertising. Our advice to the Izaak Walton League is this: If you can't say anything good about Mud Lake, don't mention it at all. Or at least stick within the bounds of truth.

Notice of Annual Meeting

The Annual Meeting of the Marshall County Scandinaviske Mutual Fire Insurance Company will be held in the School Building of the Consolidated School in the Village of Newfolden, on the 14th day of June, 1932, for the purpose of electing two Directors to fill the place of Nels Skaug and John Halvorson, whose terms expire, and to transact any other business proper to be at the said meeting. Policyholders are earnestly urged to attend. Meeting to be called to order at 1 o'clock P. M.

Dated at Newfolden June 1st, 1932.

Annual Junior Short Course

Plans have been completed for the Annual Junior Short Course to be held at the Northwest School beginning Tuesday and continuing through Thursday of next week. H. A. Pflughoeft, district club leader, expects over 300 young people to register for the special instruction in the various 4-H club projects. The total expense of board, room, and entertainment will be $1.50 which is just half the fee required last year. Room reservations may be made by writing the Northwest School of Agriculture, Crookston.

Salvation Army Organizes Annual Home Service Appeal

The five county annual Salvation Army home service appeal in which this year Marshall, Roseau, Kittson, Red Lake and the Lake of the Woods counties participate simultaneously during June is now being lined up and organized with workers.

From the appeal headquarters in the Warren Court House, Campaigner John M. Lindon, announces that the quota fet for Holt to raise is $50.00 and that the local treasurer is Mr. Geo. Fricker at the Marshall County State Bank. Contributions may be left at the bank at any time.

Since the Salvation Army does not ask funds to enrich itself but that it may help 'OTHERS' and especially just now the unfortunate unemployed in Minnesota, no doubt, many here will gladly contribute a bit when the opportunity is given.

H. O. Chommie was a business caller in town Wednesday.

Arthur Thompson, our local dray man hauled a big load of livestock to Fargo on Monday. The load was picked up at four different farms southeast from town.

Rev. L. M. Redal, Guy Anderson and H. O. Hanson returned home Monday evening from the Twin Cities where they spent a few days attending the biennial conference of the Norwegian Lutheran Church of America.

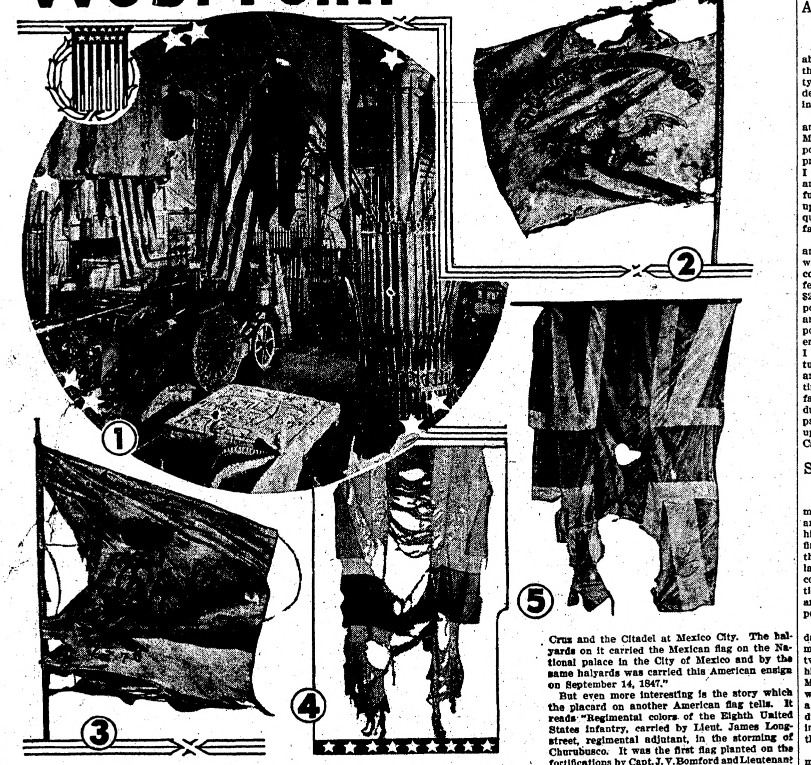
A Shrine of Flags at West Point



1.—The museum at the United States Military academy at West Point. Note X-arrangement of the stars on the American flag in the middle.

2.—One of the Hessian flags, captured at Trenton and once the property of George Washington.

4.—A battle-torn British flag, which became the property of the Americans when Cornwallis surrendered at Yorktown.

5.—British king's colors or regimental Union Jack of the Seventh Royal Fusiliers. Probably the first British flag captured during the Revolution.

By ELMO SCOTT WATSON

JUNE 14 is Flag day and on that day patriotic Americans will pay tribute to the emblem which "symbolizes the freedom, equality, justice and humanity for which our forefathers sacrificed their lives and personal fortunes" and which "represents a nation of over 100,000,000 free people, its Constitution and institutions, its achievements, and aspirations." Everywhere—over homes, business offices and public buildings—the Red, White and Blue will be displayed in celebration of the anniversary of the day when the Continental congress in session in Philadelphia "Resolved, That the Flag of the thirteen United States be thirteen stripes, alternate red and white; that the Union be thirteen stars, white in a blue field, representing a new constellation."

There are several places in the United States which have become "flag shrines" because of their association with the history of our flag and there could be no more appropriate celebration of Flag day than a visit to one of these shrines on that day.

One of them is the little house at 239 Arch street in Philadelphia, where once lived Elizabeth Griscom Ross, famous in American legend as "Betsy Ross," who, even though she may not have been, as the legend has it, "the maker of the first American flag," was certainly one of the early ones. Another is the reconstructed Fort McHenry in Maryland where was displayed the flag which provided the inspiration for Francis Scott Key's "Star Spangled Banner." Still another is the case in the National museum in Washington where is displayed the very flag which Key saw "by the dawn's early light." It was this flag which gave him the inspiration for the immortal poem that has become our national anthem—"The Star-Spangled Banner." Then, too, there is the monument in Old City cemetery in Nashville, Tenn., which marks the last resting place of Capt. William Driver, the New England sea captain, who first called the flag "Old Glory."

Interesting as all of these are because of their individual parts in the history of our national emblem, there is no place, perhaps, where so much flag history can be found in one place as in the museum at the United States Military academy at West Point. In its cases are displayed colors which not only cover more than a century of American history but which, as individual flags, played their part in stirring events in all of our wars from the Revolution to the Spanish-American war.

One group of flags which has a special appeal during this, the Washington bicentennial year, is composed of British and Hessian colors which were once the property of Gen. George Washington, having probably been surrendered at Yorktown in 1781 with the command of Lord Cornwallis. These flags were bequeathed to George Washington Parke Custis, son of Washington's adopted son and grandson of Martha Washington. Custis bequeathed them to the War department, who received them in 1858, whereupon Secretary Floyd sent them to West Point.

Meager as are the records for these flags, the labels on them suggest innumerable thrilling stories of the days when Washington and his Continentals were fighting what so often seemed to be a hopeless fight for American liberties. Here is one described as "British king's colors or regimental Union Jack of the Seventh Royal Fusiliers. Probably captured at Fort Chambly, October 18, 1775, and was therefore the first British flag captured in the Revolution." What memories of the brilliant exploits of "Mad Anthony" Wayne or of the stubborn fighting in the redoubts at Yorktown are called up by the label on this one near by: "British king's colors or Union Jack, Queen Anne pattern, 1707. History not known, but this may be the flag of the Seventeenth regiment, lost at Stony Point, or the Forty-third, Seventy-sixth or Eightieth regiments, lost at Yorktown."

There are half a dozen or more flags described as "Ansbach-Bayreuth, German mercenaries colors, bearing the date of 1770, captured at Yorktown" and "Flags captured from the Hessians, one taken at Trenton, and two others either captured at Trenton or at Yorktown." No doubt Washington often looked upon these colors, while they were in his possession, with particular pride for they were relics of the two high points in his career as a soldier.

Reminiscent of the fierce border wars in New York during the Revolution, when green-coated Tory and black-painted Iroquois carried the tomahawk and the torch against their erstwhile neighbors who had espoused the Patriot cause, are two flags close by those previously described. One is labeled "Captured English colors, probably Revolutionary war or War of 1812. Imitation British king's colors or Union Jack. Queen Anne pattern, 1707. Probably a Tory or renegade flag and believed to be the flag of Colonel Butler's Rangers carried in the Susquehanna region during the Revolution and at the Wyoming massacre, also believed to have been taken at Fort George in Upper Canada, May 27, 1813." The other is even more historic if the following inscription is correct: "Captured British colors, Revolution or War of 1812. Imitation British king's colors or Union Jack. Queen Anne pattern, 1707. A Tory flag which has an olive green St. George's Cross. May be either Sir John Johnson's 'Royal Greens' flag captured at Fort George in Upper Canada May 27, 1813. Or it is possible that this flag was captured by Colonel Willett at Fort Stanwix, New York, August 6, 1777."

Close by the British and Hessian colors captured during the Revolution are the colors of another foreign enemy captured in a later war—Mexican flags taken by the troops of Scott and Taylor below the Rio Grande. And there are American flags there, too, which played an important part in that conflict. One of them is designated as "The first flag hoisted over Vera Cruz and the Citadel at Mexico City. The halyards on it carried the Mexican flag on the National palace in the City of Mexico and by the same halyards was carried this American ensign on September 14, 1847."

But even more interesting is the story which the placard on another American flag tells. It reads: "Regimental colors of the Eighth United States infantry, carried by Lieut. James Longstreet, regimental adjutant, in the storming of Churubusco. It was the first flag planted on the fortifications by Capt. J. V. Bomford and Lieutenant Longstreet and it was the second flag planted on the battlements of Chapultepec by Lieut. George E. Pickett. It was claimed by the regiment to be the first American flag to enter the city of Mexico." Such is the record of this flag in the Mexican war. Is it necessary to remind any American that these same men who carried it then rose to greater fame in a greater conflict later—Longstreet as a general in the Confederate army on many a hard-fought field from 1861 to 1865 and Pickett as the leader of that immortal charge up the slope at Gettysburg?

The Civil war flags in the museum are legion, including such notable colors as General Sheridan's headquarters flag for the Cavalry Reserve Brigade, First Division, Cavalry Corps, Army of the Potomac, with its record of 55 battles and the colors of the Fifth cavalry, the "Fighting Fifth" of later Indian fighter fame, with 61 battles on its record. But perhaps the most historic Civil war flag there is one which is labeled thus: "Flag of the First New York Zouaves (Col. Ephriam Elmer Ellsworth's Zouaves). It is claimed that this flag was placed on the staff of the Marshall house in Alexandria, Va., May 24, 1861, by Colonel Ellsworth after he had pulled down the Stars and Bars. He was shot dead by the hotel proprietor while descending the stairs. There is some doubt as to whether or not this is really the flag since it has 36 stars on it and the American flag did not have that number of stars until between October 31, 1864, and March 1, 1867."

Not so historic, perhaps, as the Ellsworth flag (if it is indeed the Ellsworth flag) but having connected with it a remarkable story is another carried by the Thirteenth United States Missouri Volunteer Infantry regiment. Here is the story: On Sunday morning, April 6, 1862, at the Battle of Shiloh the Confederates attacked soon after sunrise. The regiment advanced to a bridge near Shiloh, leaving its camp flag flying and only a few sick men to protect it. One, a boy named Beem, was a member of the color guard. The regiment was forced to retreat through its own camp. Cannon balls were flying through the air and one of them passed through the flag. Beem hauled down the flag, undressed wrapped the flag around his body and dressed in larger garments made his way safely through the thick of the fight in time to save the regimental flag. For this he was commissioned as an officer. This flag was presented to Professor Church of the military academy faculty in 1874 by Col. Crafts J. Wright of Glendale, Ohio, who commanded the Thirteenth Missouri during that historic Sunday battle. "It was not such a peaceful Sunday morning," wrote Colonel Wright. "My regiment lost 89 killed and wounded in about an hour, among them all of my field and staff officers."

The story of the improvised flag at Fort Stanwix is somewhat paralleled by another improvised flag which is on display in the West Point museum, described as follows: "Handkerchief flag, made of a colored handkerchief, eight stars in a blue field. Used by United States troops in an expedition in the Philippines. Above is the official record but it is probable that a small number of men were detached from the main body and sent on an expedition during the Insurrection of 1899-1902. Not wishing to be without a flag wherever they went, they made this one from the material available."

The DAIRY

ONLY TESTER CAN SHOW COW'S VALUE

Amount of Milk Production No Criterion.

A cow that doesn't produce $100 above her feed cost doesn't stay in the J. B. Kerrigan herd, Monroe county, Wisconsin. Testing is necessary to determine production and as a guide in feeding.

"A man can't judge cows by the amount of milk they produce," said Mr. Kerrigan. "I used to think it was possible. I had one cow which was pretty good at filling a 14-quart pail. I longed for a herd just like her. I am glad now that my wish was not fulfilled. I bought a tester and set it up in the barn. When I tested that 14-quart cow her milk showed 2 per cent fat.

"I've been testing a number of years and it is more valuable to me than it was when I began. I will not keep a cow which does not return $100 above feed cost. I have one that returned $286. She produced more than 700 pounds of fat one year and 696 pounds another. She has a record of 91.8 pounds fat for one month and an average of 77 pounds for seven months. I valued that cow at $1,000. She returned me that much in three years and she was only a heifer. In normal times a cow must produce 300 pounds fat in a year to clear $100. Such production is not unusual but it makes a paying herd. Such a herd can be built up by careful selection and feeding."—Capper's Farmer.

Some of the Reasons Why Milk Test Varies

You of course know that a cow's milk gradually becomes richer as the animal reaches maturity and that a high test will be obtained during the first week of the lactation period, and that as a cow nears the end of her lactation period, her milk gradually becomes richer. Aside from these long-time changes there is a possibility that an individual's milk may vary .2 or .3 per cent between milkings.

Some of the reasons for the day-to-day variation are simple but all have more or less effect. If the time between milkings is unequal, milk tests higher following the short period. Most cows also test higher in cold weather. If all the milk is not drawn a lowered tests results. Exposure reduces the test. Irregularity in feeding, milking or handling will reduce the test as will too much exercise.

When animals are tested once a month the law of averages will probably take care of any daily variation so that the estimate for the entire year is sufficiently accurate.—American Agriculturist.

Records, Not Looks, Count

"Floppy" is a red cow and one that is certainly not very pleasing to the eye. The owner of "Floppy" was going to sell her when he first joined the cow testing association in April, 1929, but the tester suggested that he give her a tryout before doing so. The first year she produced 308 pounds fat and made an income above feed cost of $99.23. The second year she produced only 351 pounds fat(due to short pasture) and made $65.39 income above feed cost. Last year, she has produced on an average 35 pounds fat per month for the first seven months, and it looks as though she will probably make above 375 pounds during the lactation. The cow testing association finds the good cows as well as the boarders.—Jens Kirkegaard, tester, Greene, Iowa, Cow Testing association, in Hoard's Dairyman.

DAIRY HINTS

Imports of cheese by the United States in 1931 were valued at nearly 40 times the exports.

* * *

Good rations and proper feeding are as important for dry cows as they are for cows in milk.

* * *

If possible, use grasses mixed with the alfalfa in seeding down permanent or semi-permanent pastures.

* * *

Even a good pasture fence will not hold a bull that wants to go places. If one dairy farmer is required to restrain his bull, certainly it is not too much to require his neighbors to keep their cows where they belong.

* * *

Purebred dairy sires should head every dairy herd milked for profit. This will insure a high standard of production in the next generation. Joint ownership of bulls and co-operative bull associations are economical ways of accomplishing herd improvement.

* * *

Milk is more than three parts water—hence the importance of not skimming the supply.

* * *

Check up on the freshening dates for cows. They should have at lease six weeks' dry period with an abundance of good feed. Cheaper milk production will be the reward.

* * *

There should be sufficient windows in the dairy barn so that it would be light enough for a living room for people, and this would require something like four square feet of glass per cow.

She smiled again, and again he felt that little chill.

"You don't understand, quite, Doctor Wells," she answered, and said no more.

"But I do," he persisted, "I do understand. It's you who don't understand. Just because you don't feel the love for him that he feels for you, you don't understand how you will hurt him. If you did—"

"If I did?" she interrupted, in that sweet quavering voice, "if I did? How foolish you are. I love him more than anybody and everything in the world put together! I would black his boots—if I could live near him. I would shovel the snow off his steps in winter—if he would be kind to me when he walked down them! Love him!"

"You couldn't understand," she said. "I love him too much to break his heart. Mine doesn't matter."

"Of course," said Motherwell slowly, eyeing her, "that is different. If you feel that way to him, it might be better not to see him, for he has changed a great deal. He's been ill, and that, and the anxiety about you, has aged him, I hear. It might be a shock to you—he was such a young-looking man."

She looked wonderingly at him.

"Ill?" she said. "Poor Cran! Yes, he would be."

Then her pale lips drew down scornfully.

"It is quite plain that you never loved anybody, Doctor Wells," she said. "A shock to me! And do you really think that I loved my husband for the way he looked? You must be a fool!"

Her voice was very quiet.

"I loved him for what he was," she said, "not for what he looked like!"

Motherwell rose and put a strong, browned hand on each of her shoulders.

"And did you never know that a man can feel the same?" he said sternly. "If you didn't, then it is time you learned, Mrs. White, for you are the fool!"

She could not grow paler, but her face seemed to turn cold and wan and her mouth drooped, as she stared at him.

"You—you mean—"

"I mean that it's not your hair—it's not pink cheeks—it's not—good heavens, it's you he loves! It's you!"

She seemed not to breathe. Two large tears rolled down her cheeks, but her eyes never left his.

He shook her slightly.

"Lord!" he said sharply, "if I were a woman, I wouldn't dare insult a man so! I'd be ashamed—ashamed!"

She shuddered a little, then dropped her face on his hand and cried. After a moment he leaned down to her.

"You'll go to him?" he said softly.

"I'll—I'll go—and see!" she whispered, sobbing.

Coggeshall's cup and spoon clinked in the hall and he beckoned her in.

"That's good," he said, appreciating her filled tray, "see that she takes plenty. And get a heavy coat from the doctor. We ought to be leaving soon. I'll do a little telephoning."

Buried in fur, she sat between them in the curtained car. Hanson and one of the other men disappeared and their chauffeur did not speak, beyond a brief "Yes, sir," to his orders.

Motherwell talked easily, with comfortable pauses, during the journey; the two women made but brief answers. "Why did you frighten us so with those jewels?" he asked quietly. "Didn't you realize we would naturally suppose you had—had gone away with them?"

"Jewels?" she repeated vaguely. "Oh, yes! Why—I had them with me—I was taking them to Glen. I had only one key to the safe. I thought it would be better. I didn't mean to stay at the doctor's—" Her voice sank.

"You shouldn't have thrown the Medusa away, you know," he said suddenly, after another silence.

"I threw it as far as I could," she answered quickly, "into the mud! Under the wheels! A hideous, cruel thing!"

"And yet she was beautiful," he said quietly.

She caught her breath and looked up at him so touchingly that he found her hand and gave it an assuring, friendly grip.

When they drew up at the great portico of the hotel, she shrank back and would not or could not rise. Half lifted to her feet, however, she straightened herself and walked out and across the hall, barely touching the maid's offered arm. Down the long corridor they went and through a door at which Motherwell knocked, opening it himself.

No one was in the parlor of the suite and, motioning the woman to a sofa, he knocked on another door at the left. It was opened and he stood alone with Mr. Glaenzer.

To him the young man spoke rapidly for a moment, checking with a quiet gesture his cry of incredulous amazement.

"I think you had better tell him very quickly," he said. "He mustn't be shocked—and hurt him."

Glaenzer passed through a further door and a low sound of murmuring talk followed his entrance. He came out before the young man had time to be impatient and seized his hands, shaking them heartily.

"I can't understand it," he muttered. "It simply doesn't seem credible, what you've told me! By and by, perhaps I shall—but what does it matter? Where is she?"

He followed Motherwell into the parlor, crossed quickly to where the white figure sat stiff, as if frozen there, and bending, kissed her lightly on each cheek.

"Thank God, you're back, Clelia," he said. "You've driven us nearly crazy, my dear. Why, you look like a marquise at a fancy ball! Do you want to break our hearts all over again?"

She Drew Back, Staring at His Moved Face.

But she did not smile back.

"I never broke yours, Glen," she answered, hardly above a whisper. "I knew that always."

She turned to Motherwell.

"Come," she said, taking his hand like a child, and they went in together, the jeweler behind them.

She walked a few steps into the room, and stood in the full afternoon sunlight. Her lips parted and she drew a deep breath to speak, but her husband cried out before she could begin. Here was no such calmness as Glaenzer had shown; his whole face spoke his wonder and delight.

"Clelia!" he said. "Oh, Clelia! How beautiful you are!"

He opened his arms wide and with two long, smooth steps she was wrapped in them, kneeling by his chair, her hair against his cheek.

He pressed his hand tenderly against that soft white fleece.

"I am sorry that this should have happened, if it worried and frightened my dear," he said, and his voice trembled, "but why, why could you not let me know, so that I could help you?"

She raised her face and held it close to his, her hands against his shoulders.

"You haven't seen me, Cranny," she said, "look at me, now! I am forty-six years old—I am not what you thought—I never have been."

He held her face in his hands and looked long at it.

"No, you are never what I thought," he said softly, "for you are always sweeter and more beautiful, my dear."

A slow, faint flush, like a tea-rose in autumn, grew in her cheek. She threw her arms round his neck and cried so gently that they hardly heard.

"And for your age," he went on, his voice shaken with love, "it gives me the one comfort you could not give before, my beautiful, and takes away my own terror that I could never tell you."

She drew back, staring at his moved face.

"Now we can grow old together, my dear!" he said.

[THE END.]

Obedient

Abraham Lincoln knew a good picture when he saw it. On one occasion he was shown a picture done by an amateur, and was asked to give his opinion of it.

"I can truthfully say," replied Lincoln, "that the painter of this picture is a very good painter in that he observes the Commandments."

"What do you mean by that?" asked someone.

"I mean that he hath not made to himself the likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth," replied Lincoln.

Plato's Prayer

The prayer by Plato used in the funeral services of Senator Morrow is as follows: "Beloved Pan, and all ye other gods who haunt this place, give me beauty in the inward soul, and may the outward and the inward man be at one. May I reckon the wise to be wealthy, and may I have such a quantity of gold as a temperate man and he only can bear and carry. Anything more? The prayer, I think, as enough for me."

SEA GULLS EXPERT IN AERIAL CRAFT

Could Give Pointers to Army Aviators.

Some six or seven years ago the Vineyard Gazette published its first story of the sea gulls, which, having discovered that the hard-surfaced roads serve well as a substitute for a rock, shatter scallops and quahaugs to bits by dropping them from the air to the surface of the highway. Since that time the Gazette has carried further stories, detailing the uncanny skill of these birds, who made allowance for wind velocity with the accuracy of an expert rifleman or airplane bomber, never missing the narrow road or failing to drop the shellfish from a height sufficient to shatter the shells. All of this may be verified.

Other newspapers have made similar discoveries about gulls in various places, and it has become quite the seasonable thing for them to carry an acount of the activities of these natural sky riders whenever the shellfish are easily obtainable and attract the birds. But the Gazette now presents a new angle on the Vineyard seagulls, together with the solution of a mystery that has for long been a puzzle to islanders.

For several years it has been noticed by passersby on the Edgartown-oak Bluffs road that in the vicinity of Anthiers Bridge there are apt to be found the mortal remains of large rats at very frequent intervals. Where they come from, or what causes their death, has been a subject for discussion, as in many cases the carcasses are found where the wheels of passing cars could not have struck them, and moreover, they always bear the appearance of having been more or less mangled and torn. It has remained for Capt. Chester Robinson to solve the mystery, which the Gazette now publishes.

According to the captain, who is well versed in natural history, and has spent much time in observing the activities of sea birds, the ordinary sea gull is fond of rats and mice. The remains of shellfish, scattered along the road in this locality, act as bait, attracting these rodents from long distances. They hide in the beach grass when cars or pedestrians approach, but when the highway is clear they will scamper about the road, eating the fragments of scallop or quahaug that they find in the emptied shells.

At this juncture the highly efficient gulls get in their skilled and deadly work. Soaring aloft with a heavy quahaug in their beaks, they mount to an unusual height, and hovering and shifting their position, gauging the wind and drift to a nicety, they drop the shellfish with a precision that almost never fails to connect with the rodent below, knocking it unconscious or killing it outright on the spot, whereupon the gulls descend and feast on fresh meat.

The Vineyard may justly claim the first actual bomb-dropping gulls ever to be reported to date, and army aviators may pick up some valuable hints by studying these birds and their methods.—Vineyard Gazette.

Him—Aw, stop hoarding!—Pathfinder.

Valuable Coal Discovery

A rich vein of coal, sixty-eight feet in thickness, has been uncovered on the edge of the famed burning mines near Summit Hill, Pa. Mining engineers reported the vein extends along the ridge if the mountain, along which strippings operations are now being conducted.

Tell yourself you are a fool and it may do you good, tell another he is one and it will do you harm.

Ancient "Cooking Pits" Unearthed in Ireland

It is reported that nine "faluchtda" (cooking pits) have recently been discovered in the following places around Kinsale, Ireland—Ballintober, Coolcorrin, Mellinfontstown, Ringrone, Ballinvredig, Tigsaxon, Kippagh, Scilly Glen and Clashmore. Townshend, in his "Statistical Survey of the County Cork" mentions that in that part of Ireland heaps of burnt stones are found in great numbers, which are said to have been used by the inhabitants in ancient times for cooking their victuals. Keating in his "History of Ireland" refers to the mode of cooking. He says the ancient inhabitants were in the habit of digging two large pits, one of which was for washing, the other for cooking. Stones heated red-hot were thrown in, and upon these were laid the meat bound in green bulrushes; upon this again was placed another heap of hot stones, and so on, until the required quantity was disposed of.—Montreal Family Herald.

"Pay it with eggs" was the slogan of Ralph Dunbar, Prescott (Ariz.) poultry dealer, who distributed 11 dozen eggs to policemen by way of rewarding them for recovering a $12 storage battery that had been stolen from his truck.

Pictured here is Bobbie Holcombe, 1841 Howell Mill Rd., Atlanta, Ga., riding "horse." He has always been an Eagle Brand baby, has never been sick, and at seven months weighs 21 pounds.

This 5-month-old daughter of Mrs. W. Gevekoth, 3 Prospect St., New Rochelle, N. Y., was "small and thin when born, and no formula would agree. On Eagle Brand," her mother writes, "she has gained steadily and is now the picture of health."

This husky life-saver—well-built, and strong—is Edson R. Tamblyn, Jr., 150 Union St., Ridgewood, N. J. He is an Eagle Brand baby—just two years old—and tops the scales at 32 pounds.

Judge a baby food by the babies it builds

Look at them—three of the hundreds of thousands of babies that are raised, each year, on Eagle Brand. Their mothers sent their pictures to The Borden Company—as countless mothers do each year—because they are proud of the look of these babies—eager to have us show other mothers what Eagle Brand does in building a fine physique, a happy disposition, a good foundation for health through the years.

Look at the way their bones are shaping—strong and sturdy. See how their healthy, normal growth is making them fine-looking, "well-favored."

And then consider this: In the 75 years since Gail Borden put Eagle Brand on the market, three generations—millions—have been raised on this wonderfully digestible food. No other food, except mother's milk, has such long-continued, practical evidence of its success in baby building.

Recently, in a famous baby clinic, this practical evidence was scientifically verified—in a feeding test with 50 average infants. Judged by X-ray pictures of bone structure, blood counts, weight and height records, every modern check on growth, these Eagle Brand babies proved themselves ideally nourished.

If you cannot nurse your baby, try Eagle Brand. See feeding directions on label. Send for "Baby's Welfare," containing feeding instructions, general information on baby care. We will gladly send your physician a report of the above scientific feeding test.

Points scientists look for in judging a baby

The Desert's Price

By William MacLeod Raine

A story of the cattle range, a tale of feud and romance. For years the McCanns and the Starks have openly carried on a bitter feud. When Julia Stark comes home from school in Los Angeles and sees William McCann, there is the call of youth to youth. Then old Stark is found dead with a bullet hole in his temple and young McCann standing by. Almost simultaneously there is a shot and McCann falls. Enemies though they are, Julia nurses him back to life. Despising him for what she believes he did, yet loving him for himself—she works out her own romance.

William MacLeod Raine has given us a story of a desert feud, of lives filled with active living, with great hates, great adventures, great loves—a story which holds the reader to the interest of the rapidly developing plot.

It will run serially in these columns and you will want to read it. Watch for the opening chapters.

Early History of North Country to Be Reviewed

The northernmost area of the United States proper will be the goal of an excursion that will open the celebration on June 18 and 19 of the two-hundredth anniversary of the arrival at Lake of the Woods of La Verendrye, the noted French explorer. This celebration, which is being sponsored by the Roseau County Historical society and Old Settlers association, will begin with an excursion on Lake of the Woods to Massacre Island and to the site of old Fort St. Charles, which La Verendrye built in what is now known as the Northwest Angle—the northernmost jut of the United States.

The other features of the program will center in Warroad and will include a historical pageant depicting the coming of the French and the unveiling of a marker on the site of the post that the American Fur Co. built about 1820.

New Tax on Checks To Be Handled by Banks

Collection of the new two-cent tax on checks, drafts and similar instruments which goes into effect on June 21 will cause no inconvenience to bank depositors of the country, but will be handled entirely by the banks. The internal revenue bureau said Wednesday the banks would pay the tax to the treasury at the end of each month. During the period, the banks will keep count of the number of checks drawn by each depositor, and at the end of the month enter the charge against his account and enclose a statement in the depositor's cancelled checks. Counter-checks which are cashed by the depositor at the bank are not taxed.

Statement from Selvig

To My Friends in the 9th District:

I need your help. The campaign for state-wide congressional nominations is too expensive for one who has been a schoolmaster until elected to Congress (and a congressman's salary doesn't leave as much as you think after all the inevitable expenses have been paid) and I can not aford to put on a big publicity campaign all over Minnesota. So I am going to ask each of you to sit down and write to a number of your friends in other parts of the state, by letter or post card, and ask them to include Selvig in the list of nine for whom they intend to vote. Do it now. Every letter like that will help.

Yours most sincerely,
Conrad G. Selvig.

Rural Credit Bureau Adopts Direct-to-Purchaser Policy

Expanding its recently adopted direct - to - the - purchaser sales policy, which eliminates all commissions to land agents and other, the State Rural Credit board today announced the opening of two new sales offices, one at Mahnomen, Minn., in charge of Henry Harty, of Mahnomen, and the other at Alexandria, with P. C. Brown of Fergus Falls in charge. Another office, in the southern part of the state, is to be opened soon, Thomas Frankson, secretary of the board, said.

The two new offices give the state a total of four, others being operated at Thief River Falls, in charge of John Wold, and at North Branch, where Elias Nordgren is in charge, both in the heart of territory where the majority of state-owned farms are located.

Sales record as of June 1 reveal 75 former state-owned farms sold so far in 1932 covering 7,289 acres. There were seven sales in January involving 682 acres, 15 in February with 1,720 acres, March, 14 sales and 1,581 acres; April, 19 sales and 2,241 acres, and May, 20 sales 1,015 acres. The acreage was small in May because many of the sales were in the so-called Argonne farms, south of Minneapolis all of which are two to seven acre tracts.

In addition to these sales, 26 others are pending before the board and more than 100, where prices offered were below the true present-day value of the land, were rejected. The state has no intention to dump its farms on the market and the fact that more offers were rejected than accepted bears out this policy.

Records as of June 1 reveal the state now owns 2,466 farms, acquired through foreclosure or quit claim deeds. This is an increase of 92 in May. The figure was 2,240 on February 1. Altho sales are increasing, 20 farms being sold in May this year as compared to two in May, 1931, foreclosures are also increasing as actions started more than a year ago, many of them before the present board was functioning, are completed, and the sales program is being speeded as much as possible to keep the number of state-owned places down. It has been forecast the state will own 3,000 farms by January 1, 1933, unless some sort of legislation, such as the Frazier bill, to refinance farms at low interest, is made into law.

The state has now completed reappraisals on nearly all its farms but Mr. Frankson made it plain farms are being sold at prices in line with other property and that no state-owned farms are being "dumped" on the market regardless of price.

Veterans Win First Skirmish In Soldier Bonus Fight

WASHINGTON, June 16 (AP) —The banner of victory was hoisted above the house of representatives Wednesday by the Army of 20,000 war veterans bivouacked at the capitol to demand immediate payment of their bonus certificates.

By 209 to 176 the house agreed to issuance of $2,400,000,000 in new currency to meet the demands of the veterans who have converged on Washington from all sections of the nation.

Jubilant over their temporary victory, the former service men faced a fierce struggle in the senate where leaders predicted they had enough votes to kill the legislation. President Hoover has promised a veto if it reaches the White House.

Quite a number of people from here took in the doings at the state firemen's convention held in Thief River Falls this week.

The next convention will be held in St. Paul.

C. L. Sandberg, Harry Engen and H. O. Hanson made a business trip to Thief River Monday evening. They were down and found a suitable place for Knute Flakne to stay.

Mr. Flakne who has been in the St. Lukes hospital for six weeks was released from there Monday and, altho he is not able to walk around much, he feels pretty good now.

Marshall County Creameries Picnic To Be Held July 10

Sunday, July 10 is the date set for the annual picnic of the Marshall County Creameries association, according to a decision of officers of the association made at a meeting held in Viking recently. The late date was set in preference to the June date, so as not to interfere with several other gatherings during the month that will attract the attention of Marshall county residents. Leonard Larson was named chairman of the Sports committee. The speaker for the picnic has not yet been named. Representatives of each creamery met at the OldMill last Thursday to arrange concessions.

Jornada de la Muerte

From the bench where Wilson McCann had drawn up his horse he looked across the shimmering desert.

Beyond the level waste were sun-drenched lomas in the draws of which patches of shadow rested, welcome to the spirit in a landscape so flooded with light. Up one of these arroyos he would ride to the Frio River country where his father Peter McCann was lord of the Middle Justice, the High, and the Low.

The young man shifted his seat so that one foot was lifted from the stirrup and the other supported part of his weight. The dark brown face was hard, with lean jaw set tight. Nothing of the thoughts behind were mirrored in the inscrutable gray eyes.

Unmoving, he sat for many minutes. The desert held for him fascination. It was the dominating influence not only of his own life but of that of all living near. At times he hated everything it stood for—drought, starvation, and bleaching bones, fierce struggle, temporary victory, certain and final defeat. None the less it was a magnet to his thoughts. What was the mystery of its enticement? How could he find the key to its hidden meaning?

Jornada de la Muerte had come down from early days as the name of the desert. Those who lived on its border rarely used the Spanish designation for it. To call this sand stretch the Journey of Death would have been a concession to sentiment and to dread that few cared to make. Painted desert was the word these grim taciturn men preferred.

But the Spanish name was well chosen. For everything within reach of its dry winds fought for existence.

The desert set the conditions for men, too, young McCann thought bitterly. To survive he must have in him something of the tough skin of the cholla, of the poison of the sidewinder, of the pouncing lust to kill of the wild cat. He must endure heat and thirst and hunger or he must perish.

Through the stillness of the drowsy land a shot rang out sharply. McCann listened, intent and crouched. In this wilderness the explosion might mean one of many things: a man in a hill pocket, his back to a rock wall, flinging defiance at a circle of enemies; a bullet flung from ambush and a sprawled figure huddled on the dry sand; a pilgrim lost and panic-stricken; or the mere wanton exuberance of a vaquero.

A second and a third shot followed, at intervals evenly spaced. It was a distress signal, a call for help.

McCann drew his revolver and fired into the air to let the one in need know that help was on the way. Then, swiftly but without panicky haste, he turned and rode along the bench.

Presently another shot echoed down the ravine up which he was moving. This was meant to direct him, McCann guessed, and he fired once more for assurance to the one in distress.

"Go to it, Jim-Dandy," he urged, and put his horse at the steep incline leading up from the arroyo.

A gentle slope led from the edge of the arroyo to the base of a hogback which rose knobbily like emaciated vertebrae of Mother Earth's spine. The quick eye of the rider searched for and found a way up.

From the summit McCann looked down on a small grassy park. This was old Jim Yerby's place. In what seemed to this young fellow pre-historic days he had settled here because of a spring that not even in the most arid years dried entirely. Among the live oaks nestled a low adobe cabin.

In front of the hut a woman was standing. She had in her hands a rifle.

The rider looked across the little park and discovered that the woman was young, almost a girl, slender and graceful of figure. He wondered who she could be.

"Jim Yerby's hurt," she said, waiting for no introduction. "He's broken his leg. Horse fell on him."

While she elaborated the fact the young man's train of thought still clung to her. What was she doing here? Where had she come from? How did it happen he did not know her, since residents were few in this end of the country and he was acquainted with them all?

McCann followed her into the cabin. It was a one-room shack, rectangular, with two small four-pane windows. A man lay on a home-made bed in one corner of the room. He was a little wrinkled fellow in blue overalls, gray-haired, with small quick beady eyes.

"'S matter, Jim?" the newcomer asked.

"Done bust my laig," the old-timer answered nonchalantly. "My d—d broomtail fell on me. Got scared at a diamond back. Yest'day evenin'. About two, I reckon. In Dry canyon. I seen a bunch of wild hill cattle an' was trailin' 'em when the bronc piled me."

"Couldn't get on yore hoss?"

"It lit out for home. I'd kinda liked to 'a' gone too, but I didn't get to go. No, sir. I laid right there on them rocks three years till Miss Julia come along an' seen me."

"It must have been awf'ly hot," the girl said gently.

"Tur'ble hot, an' me dry as a cork laig. I sure got good an' gaunted. That country up there is ce'tainly filled with absentees. My prospects looked billious when Miss Julia drapped round this mo'ning an' said 'Howdy?' to me. I disremember ever spendin' a night an' a day so dawggoned long."

"No water bag, Jim? Wasn't that kinda careless?" McCann asked.

"All of that, Wils. An' that ain't but half of it. I'd run outa the makin's."

He was a garrulous old fellow and the reaction of relief from the long hours of helpless waiting—hours during which he had not known whether life or death was in store for him—loosened his tongue and lifted him to a mood akin to gayety. He had broken his leg of course, but he had not come to the end of the passage. There would be plenty of time in the weeks when he was tied to a bed to "cuss" about the leg.

This done, he examined the broken leg and made preparations to set it temporarily until a doctor could be brought. He found some boards from the top of an old box and whittled them down for splints while the girl was rummaging in Yerby's war bag for a clean cotton shirt. This she tore into strips to serve as bandages.

"Ready, Jim?" the young man asked.

"Sure, Wils. Right d—d now."

Yerby endured without a groan a few minutes of intense pain. He had the primal virtue of the frontier—courage to endure quietly torture that would have set many a city man screaming.

When the amateur surgeon had finished Yerby relaxed with a sigh. "I reckon the lid woulda come off'n my private can of cuss words if you hadn't been here," he told the girl, grinning cheerfully.

She had suffered with him during the ordeal, but the hands that had helped McCann had not trembled. "I know it hurt a lot," she replied. "Now I'm going to wash your face with cold water. You'll feel better then."

As soon as she had gone out of the cabin to get water from the olla the younger man fired a question at Yerby. "Who is she?"

Into the black beady eyes of the old-timer a gleam of humor flickered. "Boy, ride yore own range. Ain't this young lady done saved me when I had a through ticket for Kingdom Come? You go read yore story books an' see how it always comes out after that."

"You durned old alkali, come clean. Who is she?"

The old-timer slowly blew smoke rings toward the ceiling. "My, this li'l boy's a regular parrot. Don't know but one sentence, looks like. Course I don't blame him none. She's ce'tainly a mighty easy young lady to look at. But no use him lookin'. He's clear outa the runnin' before he ever starts."

"Why am I? She isn't married?"

"Not fur's I know."

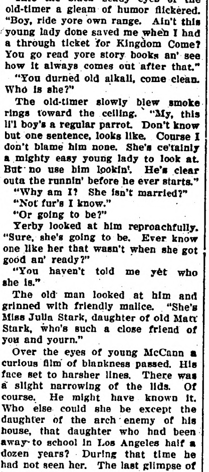
"Or going to be?"

Yerby looked at him reproachfully. "Sure, she's going to be. Ever know one like her that wasn't when she got good an' ready?"

"You haven't told me yet who she is."

The old man looked at him and grinned with friendly malice. "She's Miss Julia Stark, daughter of old Matt Stark, who's such a close friend of you and yourn."

Over the eyes of young McCann a curious film of blankness passed. His face set to harsher lines. There was a slight narrowing of the lids. Of course. He might have known it. Who else could she be except the daughter of the arch enemy of his house, that daughter who had been away to school in Los Angeles half a dozen years? During that time he had not seen her. The last glimpse of her had been a characteristic one.



"Jim Yerby's Hurt," She Said, Waiting for No Introduction.

Astride a bareback horse she had flashed past him, a stringy thirteen-year-old girl, all long legs and flying black hair and big dark eyes. It was hard to believe that wild little hoyden had grown up into a beauty. He remembered her a pert and saucy minx, brought up wholly among men except for an old Mexican cook. Even then there had been war between the McCanns and the Starks.

His instinct now was not to let her know just yet who he was. He did not search for the reason of it. The feeling was enough. It was clear she did not recognize him. Five years had transformed him from a gangling boy to a man.

"Unless you want a rookus in the house, better not tell her who I am, Jim," young McCann suggested. "She's a sure enough pepper box when she gets to going good."

The girl returned with a basin of water, a towel, and a piece of torn rag for a wash cloth.

The old-timer protested. "Now looky here, ma'am, I'm a heap obliged to you, but I can wash my own face an' not trouble you. I been doing it a right smart time without a valley."

"Off an' on—for a hundred an' how many years, Jim?" murmured the younger man.

"Hmp! I'm fifty-seven, if you want to know. An' I never was sick a day in my life. You young sprouts think—" Jim became sputteringly inarticulate.

"I like mature men myself," Miss Stark announced and sat down on the edge of the bed prepared for business.

Before Yerby could master effective opposition a soapy rag was traveling over his face.

"You go to—Yuma!" retorted the indignant homesteader.

His nurse took charge imperiously. "Better go out and take the saddle off Mr. Yerby's horse. I put it in the corral."

McCann went. When saddle and bridle were off, the animal flung up its heels and went flying round the corral.

Meanwhile Miss Julia Stark was asking her host a question.

"Who is he?"

"Fellow from over the Frio way. I get them young riders all mixed up," he answered evasively.

"One of McCann's riders?" she asked quickly. "I don't remember him."

"They're always driftin' in an' out. Mostly their homes are under their hats."

"Yes," she agreed, not wholly satisfied with this explanation. She had an impression that she had seen him before and ought to remember who he was.

McCann appeared in the doorway. "Expect I'd better go for Doc Sanders now," he said to the girl. "Unless you'd rather ride home and have one of yore boys go for him. Maybe that would be better."

"No, I'll stay. But I wish you'd stop at the Circle Cross and tell my father I won't be home till late. He'll get to worrying. Tell him not to send for me. I'll come back with the doctor."

On the brown face of the young man was a faint sardonic grin. In not letting her know who he was he had built a trap for himself. He reflected that he would be as welcome at the Circle Cross as a June hail storm in a grain-raising country. But he had to go through now or drag his tail.

"I'll stop on my way," he promised.

* * *

The sun's rays streamed down the arroyo through which McCann and Doctor Sanders rode. By the time they came to a sight of the desert long shadows were stretching across from the lomas.

McCann drew up. "I reckon here's where we part, Doc. See you later."

Doctor Sanders, a small plump man in a land of lank giants, gave him the valedictory of the plains, "So long," then deflected, to follow a trail leading to the right. His companion pushed into a small gorge in front of him.

The Flying VY and the Circle Cross ranches were twenty miles apart, but distance could not obliterate the hatred of the owners. They had been close friends once, Peter McCann and Matthew Stark. In their youth they had side by side chased Texas brush-splitters over the salt grass bumps. Together they had followed the westward tide of migration to Arizona. In their hours off duty they had frolicked as side partners at the round-up camps and at the small tendejons of the border towns. Their comradeship had been a byword in the country where they were known.

Into their lives a girl had come, Jessie Farwell, daughter of the cattleman for whom they both worked. They quarreled.

Stark won Jessie for his bride. The years passed, and each left both men more prosperous, more powerful in the community. Their enmity was known of all men even before their political ambitions and their financial interests collided. On opposing tickets they ran for sheriff and McCann was elected. Their wandering herds overlapped. The punchers of each clashed over water holes, over calves wrongly branded by mistake. Charges of rustling were bandied back and forth, at first out of animosity rather than any serious belief in their truth. Trouble followed.

Then, dramatically, the curtain rolled up for a scene of grim tragedy. A Circle Cross rider was found lying face down at the bottom of a cut bank. He had perhaps been dry-gulched, shot from ambush, but this was not sure. Who did it nobody knew, but at the Stark ranch suspicion flew straight to the Flying VY. This had been less than two weeks before the afternoon when Wilson McCann rode through Tincup Pass to carry word to Matthew Stark that his daughter would not be home till late.

He was descending into a valley. Before him were checkerboards of irrigated grain and pasture meadow centering around the houses of the ranch. Cattle were browsing in the valley. Leisurely a rider was moving across the plain toward them. All was peaceful as old age.

Directly in front of McCann's horse a spurt of sand flew. The crack of a rifle shot echoed back from the walls of the pass.

Instantly McCann's brain registered impressions and moved him to co-ordinated action. Some one had fired at him. The V-shaped sand spurt told him the attacker was almost dead ahead. With only a revolver against a rifle Wilson McCann was as helpless at this range as a child with a pop-gun. He swung Jim-Dandy as on a peg and spurred for the shelter of a large boulder beside the trail. Before he reached cover a second explosion boomed.

McCann dismounted and stood beside his horse. The second shot made it plain that the first could have been no chance bullet. For long minutes he waited, every nerve keyed to tension, eyes and ears alert for any sign of movement in the mesquite. The ambusher might be circling round to get at him from the rear. There might be two of them. The only course open to him was to let developments occur.

Out of the painful silence came sounds the trapped man knew at once—the thud of galloping hoofs, of a horse crashing through the brush. He stood a moment, stomach muscles tight, to make sure the man screened in the chaparral was not charging him; then flung himself, foot not touching the stirrup, into the saddle and lifted Jim-Dandy in a stride to swift pursuit.

In the gathering dusk they raced toward the ranch house. The ambusher had forgotten that he could use his rifle. He was in terror of the swift Nemesis riding him down. He shouted for help as his horse plunged into the open space in front of the big adobe house. Even as he threw himself from the saddle, men appeared out of the gloom to join him—one, two, three of them.

The third came out of the open hallway of the house to the porch. He was an elderly man, big and rangy, bow-legged and still strong, with hard eyes in a harsh leathery face. This was Matthew Stark.

"What's the rumpus?" he asked in a heavy voice. Then, with a flirt of a brown hand toward the farther rider. "Who is this fellow?"

The pursued man was on the porch, near the entrance to the "gallery." The rifle was clutched tightly in both hands. He was breathing heavily.

The puncher from the Flying VY moved forward from behind Jim-Dandy. "Meet Mr. Wilson McCann," he said hardily, and there was a jeer in his voice.

All those present knew him, but in the darkness, screened by his horse, they had not recognized him. His announcement made a little ominous stir. Competent hands moved quietly to be ready for an emergency.

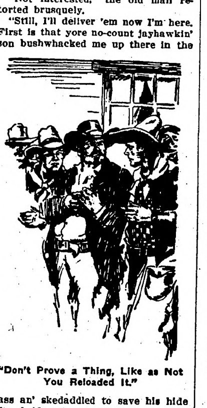
The owner of the Circle Cross looked at him steadily without speaking.

"What are you doing here?" he demanded at last abruptly.

"Why, I came to bring a message—two of 'em in fact, Mr. Stark."

"Not interested," the old man retorted brusquely.

"Still, I'll deliver 'em now I'm here. First is that yore no-count jayhawkin' son bushwhacked me up there in the pass an' skedaddled to save his hide after he'd sent a couple blue whistlers at me."



"Don't Prove a Thing, Like as Not You Reloaded It."

The cattleman turned to his son. "How about that, Jas?"

There were weakness and vice in the face of young Jasper Stark, slackness in the jaw. He answered sulkily: "I didn't aim to kill him—shot to warn him to turn back."

"That was why you fired at me again while I was makin' for cover, was it?" McCann asked with a little skeptical laugh of scorn.

"Tha's a lie. The second shot was when you plugged at me."

The rider from the Flying V Y unbuckled his belt and handed it to Matthew Stark. "Look at my gun an' see who's a liar. All the chambers are loaded."

The old man broke the revolver, examined it, and returned it to its owner. "Don't prove a thing. Like as not you reloaded it."

"While my hoss was hittin' the high spots tryin' to catch that lobe wolf," the son of Peter McCann suggested with obvious sarcasm.

Stark carried the war into the enemy's country. "You got a nerve to talk about bushwhackin' after what you did to pore Tom McArdle," he burst out angrily.

The young man's answer was instant. "Tom McArdle would be alive today if he hadn't died till a Flying VY rider killed him."

"Don't tell that to me. I know you an' all yore lying breed," Stark flung out bitterly. "I'm tellin' you that I'd as soon put faith in a yellow coyote as in any McCann ever born. An' I'm sendin' word to Pete McCann that there's a day comin' when I'll settle with interest a-plenty for what he did to McArdle. Now fork that fuzzy an' light out. I don't want you here."

"What about that gunplay up in the pass?"

"It goes as it stands. The boy's story suits me."

"Different here, an' I'm liable to tell him so when we meet again," McCann said boldly.

The old man's eyes blazed. "Like to tell him now maybe?"

The Flying VY rider looked from Stark to the men waiting tensely for the word or the lift of a hand that would serve as an order to begin hostilities. His lip curled in an ironic smile. "Not now, gentlemen."

"Then hit the dust pronto."

"Don't get on the prod, Mr. Stark. I haven't onloaded that second message yet. It's from yore daughter."

"From Jule?"

Wilson could see that the old cattleman had been struck to instant apprehension.

"She sent word by me to tell you that she'd be home late. I saw her up at old Jim Yerby's. He's broke his leg. The doc's on the way there now. You're not to send for her, Miss Stark says; she'll come with Doc Sanders when he leaves Yerby's place."

McCann swung without any haste to the saddle, glanced coolly from one to another of the watchful silent men, and headed Jim-Dandy toward Tincup Pass.

To the men of the Circle Cross, still watching him as he disappeared, there came back the taunting rhythm of a cowboy song:

Roll yore tail, and roll her high,
We'll all be angels by an' by.

Touch of Hardship May Aid One's Self-Respect

Every facility, invention and project seems to be bent on making people more "comfortable." Don't we know that we can be so "comfortable" that we will be good for nothing? Hadn't we better pursue hardship a little for its own sake, F. H. Collier asks, in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

We say this, but we hate to begin. That in itself shows, no doubt, that our moral courage has declined. There is no better philosophy than that of "doing one good deed every day" for the welfare of our fellow man. May it not be equally uplifting of the soul to do one good deed that we are afraid or indisposed to do? Most "duties" are like that. But, resolutely performed, there is a sense of triumph that is a worthy reward. That much more iron has been put into one's character.

Here we are, talking like Samuel Smiles whom, as we remember in our boyhood reading, we detested. We fear there was always sybaritic rudiments in our makeup. While we might daily seek to perform deeds of the nature described in Longfellow's "Excelsior," we were fortunate if we could tot up one or two a month. Nevertheless, the principle is indestructible.

Offset All Good

"When my ancestors invented gunpowder," said Hi Ho, the sage of Chinatown, "they created an evil force strong enough to offset all the good to be hoped for from the teachings of Confucius."—Washington Star.

Vienna Old and Beautiful

Vienna, founded 2,000 years ago by the Romans, destroyed and rebuilt several times, is still a queen among modern cities, although it is no longer the residence of an imperial court. It has a famous opera, by many considered among the best in German-speaking lands. It certainly has the oldest tradition, dating back into the Seventeenth century. The public buildings, palaces, galleries, educational institutions, theaters and museums offer an inexhaustible fund of beauty and instruction.

Makes World Hard Place

"To laugh at the misfortunes of others," said Hi Ho, the sage of Chinatown, "gives others an excuse to assume that you enjoy calamity and will not resent laughter at your own sorrowings. It is this ungenerous reciprocity that so often has made the world hard to live in."—Washington Star.

Reptile Traveler Welcomed

A young emperor boa constrictor is making his home in the Philadelphia zoo after a journey from the jungles of tropical Brazil in a bunch of bananas. The snake caused a near-panic when Philip Braverman, who operates a fruit store, unwrapped the cover from a bunch of bananas he had bought from Brazil. The snake dropped to the floor and police were summoned, captured it and turned it over to C. Emerson Brown, director of the zoo. Brown said that it was a rare specimen and that he had never heard of a boa constrictor making the trip from Brazil in a bunch of bananas.

Asia's "Enlightenment"

A traveler who recently toured Asia says that 75 per cent of the people of that country are in total ignorance of what is going on in the world outside of their immediate vicinity. Few have ever heard of the World war. Many of them know nothing of the League of Nations, and the news of the present Manchurian situation is likely to reach them long after it has been cleared up. But even this is regarded as a great sign of hopefulness, for a few decades ago the percentage of ignorance was related at 95.

World's Copper Output

Three-fourths of the world's output of copper in 1929 came from mines directly under American control, according to Social Science Abstracts, in a review of an article appearing in a recent Swedish periodical. In 1930, America was for the first time a net importer of copper. The world output doubled in each of the three thirteen-year periods, between 1874 and 1913, but it has failed to double itself in the eighteen years since 1913.

She Reduced 38 Pounds The Safe Way

"I have been taking Kruschen Salts for 4 months and I think they are wonderful. I am 32 years old and 5 ft. 2 in. tall. I was very fat. I weighed 165 lbs. and now I weigh 127 lbs. and feel fine. If I let up taking the Salts one morning I feel lazy and heavy," Mrs. Florence Loftus, Boston.

This is just one of hundreds of letters we get every month—Kruschen not only causes you to lose fat but while you are losing it you gain in health—in vivaciousness—you lose fat where fat is most prominent and at the same time keep stomach, liver, kidneys and bowels functioning naturally.

Any drugstore in the world will sell you a jar of Kruschen for a trifling sum—take one-half teaspoonful in a glass of hot water every morning—go light on fatty meats, potatoes and sweets. But for your health's sake demand and get Kruschen Salts—imitations are numerous. It's the little daily dose that does it.

Spain "Coddles" Prisoners

With the advent of the republic the daily allowance for rations to a prisoner in the Spanish jails was increased from 1 peseta to 1 peseta 50 centimos. That put the prisoners nearly on an equal basis with the sailors, whose allowance amounted to 1 peseta 75 centimos.

Especially Fish Stories
